This was supplemented by the Act of July 1, 1881,²¹ which applied the homestead laws to Indian generally who had been located on public lands rather than to a "special class," and contained a 25-year "trust period" provision almost identical to that contained in the General Allotment Act.²² The same principles applied to the General Allotment Act allotments would seem, therefore, applicable to lands acquired under the 1881 Act.²³

D. LAND PURCHASED WITH RESTRICTED FUNDS

In 1928 the Mezzini report on "The Problem of Indian Administration" was published. Its authors had had occasion to study the then perplexing problem of the taxability of land purchased with restricted funds and their comments concerning it are particularly enlightening:

* * * A perplexing problem confronting the Indian Office today is the taxation by the states of the lands purchased for the Indians with their restricted funds which are under the supervision of the Office. The volume of such purchases is large because the allotments originally made to the Indians are often not suitable for homes. These original allotments must be sold and new property purchased at the Indians are to be started on the road to better social and economic conditions. In order to preserve these new lands for the use and benefit of the Indian owner, it has been the uniform rule to impose upon them the restrictions which existed upon the funds with which they were obtained. Some states are claiming and exercising the power to tax such lands. Since the Indian owner, on account of his lack of ready funds or his insufficient sense of public responsibility, either cannot or will not pay taxes, the result is that the lands purchased for his permanent home are speedily slipping from him and he himself is becoming a homeless public charge. This unfortunate situation is remedied more or less because the terms of the deeds prohibit alienation by voluntary act, and thus the Indian owner is not able either to mortgage or sell his lands to secure for himself the interest that he may have in the land over and above the delinquent taxes.

The United States Supreme Court²⁴ held at an early date that the allotted lands of the Indians, the title to which was held in trust by the United States, were not taxable by the states. This policy of withholding land to the Indians and holding the title to it in abeyance until such time as they could be trusted with its full and free control had been adopted by the national government as a means for more fully civilizing the Indians and bringing them to the position where they could assume the full responsibility of citizenship. The lands were therefore the instrumentalities of the United States, and as such, by virtue of long-standing principles of constitutional law, not taxable by the several states. To this unquestioned decision may be added the ruling that, in the event of the sale of the allotted lands by governmental consent, the proceeds, being simply the medium for which the lands were exchanged, were likewise held in trust by the government and not taxable.²⁵ This Supreme Court has also sustained the power of the Secretary of the Interior, in whom is vested the discretion to permit the conveyance of Indian lands, to allow such conveyance on the sole condition that the proceeds be invested in lands subject to his control in the matter of sale.²⁶

²² National Bank of Commerce v. Anderson, 147 Fed. 87 (C. C. Minn. C. 1906), United States v. Thibault, 113 Fed. 287 (C. C. A. 8th Cir. 1903).

In spite of the intimation from these cases and from the express decisions of two district courts of the Northwest²⁷ more favorable to the Indians, the exemption from state taxes of restricted lands purchased for them by the government with their restricted funds is in a precarious situation. In a case which was taken to the United States Supreme Court²⁸ it was held that lands purchased with trust funds for an Osage Indian, and made unalienable without the consent of the Secretary of the Interior, were not taxable. This decision, however, and involving necessarily the declaration of a general principle, since the ruling was occasioned by the fact that the special act²⁹ under which these particular funds were released to the allottee gave to the Secretary no authority to control and limit the use of such release. In this case, moreover, it was shown that the money released from the trust was invested directly in the property purchased. The thought of the court is perhaps shown in its closing remark, "Congress did not confer upon the Secretary of the Interior authority to give to property purchased with released funds immunity from state taxation." By a series of recent decisions³⁰ the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit, although omitting some dicta favorable to the Indian position, has uniformly sustained state taxation of lands purchased for the Indians with their restricted funds and made subject to alienation only with the consent of the Secretary of the Interior, and has declared itself committed to the proposition that such lands are taxable.³¹ One of these cases was affirmed by the United States Supreme Court³² in a per curiam decision on the somewhat doubtful authority of the McCurdy case supra.³³

The declaration by the Circuit Court of Appeals³⁴ that the national government has no authority to withdraw from state taxation lands formerly subject thereto is certainly not tenable. Congress has the power to relieve from the burden of state taxes a governmental instrumentality, whether a post office or a home for the government's Indian wards, and it matters not that the prior status of the property may have been such that the state could freely tax it.

²⁶ See note 83, supra.

²⁷ See discussion of General Allotment Act, supra, note 83. Also see United States v. Jackson, 280 U. S. 188 (1930).

²⁸ On the other hand, some courts have held that where land is purchased for an Indian with restricted funds from another Indian who held it tax exempt, it is tax exempt in the hands of the new purchaser, the reason given being that the lands and funds involved were at all times used by the United States in the discharge of its obligation to its Indian wards. McDerham v. Ashland County, 192 Wis. 177, 212 N. W. 920 (1927); United States v. G. Menocher (D. C. E. D. Okla. June 14, 1934), Justice file No. 90-5-11-431; McDerham v. Ashland County (D. C. W. D. Okla. August 27, 1934) Justice file No. 90-5-5-88; United States v. Stone (D. C. W. D. Okla. September 20, 1934), Justice file No. 90-2-11-822.

If, as has been intimated, there be doubt as to the intention of Congress to give immunity from state taxation, it is recommended that legislation be secured expressly conferring the exemption. The states will not suffer from such a practice, for in return for the lost taxes on the purchased lands will be the subjection to the state taxing power of the relinquished lands, or of the funds used in making the new purchase.

Pending litigation should, of course, be pressed to a final conclusion with all possible speed in order that the existing uncertainty be ended. Should it transpire that these Indian lands are taxable, then the national government must fairly consider the nature of the duty to the ward of the grantor who has employed the funds for tax-exempt lands to purchase property on the express or implied misrepresentation that the newly-acquired property is likewise exempt. Several Indians have complained to the survey staff that they are being taxed despite the formal assurance of Indian Service employees that the land purchased for them would be exempt from taxation.²⁶ (Pp. 795-798.)

In the case of Shur v. Gibson-Zahner's Oil Corp.,²⁷ lands outside a reservation purchased with restricted Indian funds and subject to a restraint against alienation were held subject to state property taxation. The court, however, recognized the fact that:

There are some instrumentalities which, though Congress may protect them from state taxation, will nevertheless be subject to that taxation unless Congress speaks.²⁸ (P. 581.)

Thereafter by the Act of June 20, 1930,²⁹ Congress expressly exempted such lands from state taxation. In order that its purpose and meaning may be more fully understood, both section 1 and section 2 of the 1930 Act are quoted in full:

That there is hereby authorized to be appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $25,000, to be expended under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe, for payment of taxes, including penalties, and interest, assessed against individuals owning Indian land the title to which is held subject to restrictions against alienation or encumbrance except with the consent or approval of the Secretary of the Interior, heretofore purchased out of trust or restricted funds of an Indian, where the Secretary finds that such land was purchased with the understanding and belief on the part of said Indians that after purchase it would be non-taxable, and for redemption or repurchase of any such land heretofore or hereafter sold for nonpayment of taxes.

Sec. 2. All lands the title to which is now held by an Indian subject to restrictions against alienation or encumbrance except with the consent or approval of the Secretary of the Interior, heretofore purchased out of trust or restricted funds of said Indians, are hereby declared to be instrumentalities of the Federal Government and shall be non-taxable until otherwise directed by Congress.

The 1937 amendment³⁰ to section 2 of the above act reads as follows:

All homesteads, heretofore purchased out of the trust or restricted funds of individual Indians, are hereby declared to be instrumentalities of the Federal Government and shall be non-taxable until otherwise directed by Congress. Provided, That the title to such homesteads shall be held subject to restrictions against alienation or encumbrance except with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. And provided further, That the Indian owner or owner's shall select, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, either the agricultural and grazing lands, not exceeding a total of one hundred and sixty acres, of the village, town, or city property, not exceeding in cost $5,000, to be designated as a homestead.

The 1930 Act was passed to establish the tax-exemption of the lands purchased with restricted funds under the guidance and direction of the Interior Department as tax-exempt lands. After the passage of the act it was found that section 2 had application to such a large quantity of lands that it was introduced in Congress for its repeal. This bill was, however, amended on the recommendation of the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs to provide for restricting the tax exemption to homesteads purchased with trust or restricted funds rather than for repealing the tax exemption entirely, and the bill was passed in this amended form. The report of the Senate Committee in which this recommendation was made contains the following pertinent statement of the purpose of the 1930 Act and the 1937 amendment:

The said act of June 20, 1930 (46 Stat. L. 1542) was designed to bring relief and reimbursement to Indians who in failure to pay taxes have lost or were at risk of losing lands purchased from them under supervision, advice, and guidance of the Federal Government, which losses were not the fault of the Indians, but were purchased with the understanding and belief on their part and induced in representatives of the Government that the lands be non-taxable after purchase. It was intended that such lands would be redeemed out of the fund of $25,000 authorized to be appropriated under the provisions of said act of June 20, 1930 (49 Stat. L. 1542).

Since the passage of said act of June 20, 1930 (49 Stat. L. 1542), it was found the provisions of section 2 thereof would apply to lands and other property purchased by restricted Indian funds, which would exempt from taxation vast quantities of property, such as business buildings, town lands which are not homesteads, etc.

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs appeared before the committee and suggested the amendment herein proposed, which proposed amendment was adopted and herein recommended by your committee. (Senate Report No. 882 75th Cong., 1st sess.)

In United States v. Board of Comm's,³¹ the court, in construing these statutes, held that Congress had the power to define federal instrumentalities, and that the 1930 Act clearly applied to prevent taxation for 1930³² of real estate used for both residence and business purposes, which was purchased with restricted funds of Osage Indians. The court said that the act applied to Indians in general, and was not made inapplicable to the Osages by reason of prior acts referring specifically to Osage homesteads.

In an unreported case, the same court applied these statutes to prevent taxation of homesteads purchased with trust funds held on deposit by the United States for Pawnee Indians in lieu of allotment.³³

The further extent of the operation of these statutes is not known at the present time, but they express the clear intent of Congress to continue homesteads of Indians tax exempt, whether the homestead was purchased for the Indian or allotted to him.³⁴

SECTION 1. STATE TAXATION OF PERSONAL PROPERTY

Wherever personal property is acquired by or for tribal Indians for use on Indian reservation lands in connection with or in furtherance of the policy adopted by the Government in encouraging the Indians to cultivate the soil and to establish permanent homes and families, or otherwise and in their economic rehabilitation, such property may not be taxed by the state.¹² The immunity exists whether the property be purchased with moneys held in trust by the United States for the Indians or with moneys accruing to the Indians from other federal sources. The reason behind this doctrine of immunity is that the state has no power, by taxation or otherwise, to retard, impede, burden, or control the operations of instrumentality employed by the Federal Government in carrying into execution the powers lawfully vested in it.

In United States v. Thornton County,¹³ the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit ruled that the proceeds of the sales of allotted lands held in trust by the United States were exempt from state taxation for the reason that the proceeds, like the lands from which they were derived, constituted an instrumentality lawfully employed by the Government in the exercise of its powers to protect, support, and instruct the Indians. The court said, among other things:

The allotted lands were held in trust in the United States in the benefit of those to whom they were assigned, and then heirs, under the acts of August 7, 1882, and February 8, 1887. The proceeds of the sales of these lands have been lawfully subordinated for the lands then sales in the trustee. The substitutes purchase of the nature of the originals, and stand charged with the same trust. The lands and their proceeds, so long as they are held or controlled by the United States and the term of the trust has not expired, are alike instrumentalities employed by it in the lawful exercise of its powers of government to protect, support, and instruct the Indians, for whose benefit the complainant holds them, and they are not subject to taxation by any state or county. (P. 222)

The doctrine of the foregoing case was approved in United States v. Pearson,¹⁴ a case involving issue property, that is, property issued to the Indians by the Federal Government. Immunity from state taxation was there extended to personal property which could be traced and identified as issue property, the increase of issue property, property purchased with the proceeds of the sale of issue property, property purchased with the proceeds of the sale of the increase of issue property, property for which similar issue property has been exchanged for similar use, the increase of property received in such exchange, the increase of issue property exchanged for similar property for similar use, and property purchased with money given to the Indians by the United States.

To the same general effect is *United States v. Dewey County*¹⁵ and United States v. Erick.¹⁶ In the case first cited the court held that personal property consisting of horses, cattle, and other property issued by the United States to the Indians and used by them on their allotments was not subject to assessment and taxation by the state.

For the same reason that property purchased by Indians with restricted funds and property issued to the Indians by the Government for Government instrumentality, property purchased by the Indians pursuant to a specific plan for economic rehabilitation approved by the Government and carried out under Government supervision should likewise be recognized as a Government instrumentality. As said by the Solicitor of the Interior Department:¹⁷

The purchase of property by the Indians themselves in accordance with an economic plan worked out with the Government is unquestionably, as a method of assuring the possession by Indians of productive property, the old method of the Government's issuing such property to the Indians. From a legal viewpoint the purpose and content of the Government are identical whether the plow or the cattle are bought by the Indian with Individual Indian Moneys, the expenditure of which has been approved by the Superintendent, or bought by the Indians with revolving loan funds or judgment fund money, pursuant to a plan of rehabilitation approved by the Superintendent or bought by the Superintendent with maturity funds and issued to the Indians. The reasoning of the courts applies equally to these purchases, except that in the cases above cited the complainant had an ownership interest in the title to the property was found to be in the United States. The form of title, while indicative of the interest of the Government, is not, in my opinion, the determining factor. The important factor is the acquisition and use of the property in execution of a government plan for the Indians.

There are apparently no cases determining the right of the state to tax personal property of an Indian on a reservation which is not used pursuant to some federal plan. Apparently no state has attempted to collect such a tax. The doctrine that Indians on a reservation are not subject to state law in the absence of congressional authority¹⁸ would indicate that any such tax would be invalid.

On the other hand, personally issued to an Indian by the Federal Government and used by him outside the reservation is taxable by the state.¹⁹

Personally owned by non-Indians but held on an Indian reservation is subject to state taxation.²⁰ This is true even though the personally belongs to a Catholic mission situated on an Indian reservation and devoting both the personally and the proceeds thereof to the welfare of the Indians. In so deciding the Supreme Court declared:²¹

Taking the complaint as it is, it shows on its face that the Indians have neither any legal nor equitable title to the property, neither have they any legal or equitable right to its beneficial use, and it also appears from the complaint that the property is owned unconditionally and absolutely by the plaintiff. The plaintiff, as the owner of the cattle, may, at any time, abandon its present manner of using them and may devote them, or any income arising from their ownership, to any other purpose it may choose, and the Indians would have no legal right of complaint. The plaintiff might refuse to spend another dollar upon the Indians upon these reservations, and refuse to further maintain or aid them in any way whatever, and no right of the Indians would be thereby violated, nor could they call upon the courts to enforce the application of the plaintiff's property, or the income thereof, to the same purposes the plaintiff had theretofore applied them. There is nothing

upon the lands or privileges of the Indians, citing Blue Railroad v. Pennsylvania, 195 U. S. 431, and other cases, as authority for the decision. This is reaffirmed in the second case above cited. In this case the Indians have not even given a lease, and the owners are not obliged to pay anything for the privilege of grazing, and, as we have said, devote the property, or the income thereof, to purposes wholly foreign to the Indians themselves. However, mentioning the conduct of the owners of the cattle may be, in devoting the income on any portion of the principal of their property to the charitable work of improving and educating the Indians (and we could not admit the merit of such conduct), we cannot say that there is, on that account, the least claim for exemption from taxation because of any Federal provision, constitutional or otherwise. (Pg. 128-129)

SECTION 5. STATE SALES TAXES

The question of the extent to which Indians and persons trading with Indians are subject to state sales taxes has been treated in a recent opinion of the Solicitor of the Interior Department. "Though the questions treated arise under Arizona statutes, the problem they present is a general one and the Arizona statutes involved are not dissimilar in substance from the sales tax laws of other States. For this reason the following opinions quoted from the opinion serve to illuminate the entire subject."

There are two Arizona statutes particularly involved, each of which is illustrative of a type of sales tax law. The Revenue Act of 1935, Chapter 77, Laws Regular Session 1935, as amended by Chapter 2, Laws of First Special Session 1937, places an annual privilege tax on the business of selling at retail measured by the gross proceeds or the gross income from the business. Provision is made by the law for the use of tokens by purchasers to reimburse the dealers for the tax applicable to any sale. The other statute in question, Chapter 78, Laws Regular Session 1935, as amended in 1936, 1937, and 1938, places a tax on certain designated burdens to be paid by stamps to be affixed to the articles by the dealers. Both statutes contain, as a method of enforcement, the requirement that all dealers shall take out State licenses. Both statutes provide for an exemption from the tax of businesses and transactions not subject to tax under the United States Constitution and provide for refund to the dealer of the tax paid by him. This provision is made that the transactions and articles taxed were not subject to tax under the law. In both statutes, the tax is, on its face, a tax to be paid by dealers, whether wholesalers or retailers, and to be enforced against them, although both acts contemplate that the amount of the tax shall be added to the price paid by the consumer.

1 Application of State taxes to persons trading with Indians

The question of the application of these taxes to persons trading with Indians is subject to different answers depending upon the location of the trade and upon whether the traders or the persons dealt with are Indians. The regulation of trade with Indian tribes is one of the powers expressly delegated to Congress by section 8 of Article I of the United States Constitution. Congress has exercised this power in statutes restricting trade with the Indians and giving exclusive authority to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to regulate each trade and the prices at which goods shall be sold to the Indians. (Sections 201 through 268, Title 25 of the United States Code.) These statutes, by their terms or by indirect construction, are limited in their application to Indian reservations. United States v. Taylor, 44 F. (2d) 837 (C. C. A. 9th, 1930), cert. den. 283 U. S. 820; Rider v. La Olan, 71 Wash. 488, 188 Pac. 3, United States v. Certain Property, 26 Faw 517 (Ariz. 1917). Congress has not exercised this power to regulate trade with the Indians in so far as trade off the reservation is concerned except in the case of trade in liquor.

(a) Where Congress has exercised its authority it is axiomatic that the field is closed to State action. Agnew Oil and Gas Co. v. Oklahoma, 241 U. S. 188. Therefore, persons selling to or buying from Indians on Indian reservations are not subject to State laws which regulate or tax such transactions. However, it should be emphasized that it is trade with the Indians which is removed from State interference and not the trader himself, if the trader is a white person and is dealing with other white persons, even though such transactions occur on a reservation.

The Supreme Court has repeatedly permitted the taxation by the State of the property of white persons located on Indian reservations on the theory that such taxation did not interfere with the exercise of Federal authority within the reservation. Thomas v. Gay, 160 U. S. 264; Wagoner v. Brown, 170 U. S. 680; Cuthbert v. Missionary, 200 U. S. 118. This principle has been carried by the State courts to the extent of permitting State taxation of the property of Indian traders, including their stock on trade. Morse v. Brown, 7 Wyo 292, 51 Pac 570; Covey v. McMillan, 22 Mont 484, 50 Pac 908; Noblet v. Amorette, 71 Pac 870 (Wyo 1903). In the review of the relationship between the Federal Government and the State government on an Indian reservation, in Supplies Trading Co. v. Cook, 281 U. S. 697, the Supreme Court stated that the jurisdiction of the State over the reservation is full and complete save as to the Indians and their property.

In view of this jurisdiction of the State I held in my opinion submitted to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs on February 4, 1938, that white traders in their dealings with non-Indians must comply with the State laws, including those imposing sales taxes. I believe this ruling was correct. Traders on Indian reservations who are non-Indians are, in my opinion, required to take out licenses under the Arizona laws in question to carry on trade with non-Indians on the reservation, and must account to the State authorities for sales taxes on so much of their business as is done with non-Indians. They are not required to account to the State authorities for their transactions with Indians on the reservations, but are, if they do deal with the Indians, required to conform with the licensing provisions in the Federal statutes regulating trade with Indians. Traders who are themselves Indians are not subject to the State laws whether they deal with Indians or non-Indians.

(b) Where traders are not located on Indian reservations they are, in my opinion, responsible for the State taxes and subject to license whether or not they are Indians and whether or not they deal with Indians. Since

* Op Sol I D, M 30440, May 8, 1940

* The position of the Solicitor in this connection has been substantiated by the recent case of Neah Bay Fish Co. v. Wisconsin, 101 P. 2d 600 (Wash. 1940). The court there held that the State of Washington may levy a sales tax upon a company conducting its business solely within the Indian reservation under a license from the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the tribe, for sales made to persons other than Indians.

Congress has not attempted to regulate such trade and since such trade has been carried on subject to State laws for a long number of years, there is no ground for exemption of such trade in the absence of congressional authority, except in the special types of Indian purchases discussed in part 2 (b) of this opinion.

2. Application of State taxes to sales to Indians

This subject falls into two parts—sales to Indians on the reservation and sales to Indians off the reservation.

(a) The preceding part of this opinion demonstrates that sales to Indians on the reservation are not subject to State taxation and Indian purchasers are not required to pay the additional cost which is added to the price of the article to cover the tax. Such additions to the price of articles by State action are clearly inconsistent with the authority of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to regulate the prices at which goods shall be sold to the Indians.

(b) The preceding part of this opinion likewise demonstrates that when Indians purchase goods off the reservation they are not exempt from sales taxes on the ground of State interference with Federal regulation of Indian trade. However, certain purchases by Indians may be exempt on the ground that these purchases are instrumentalities of the Federal Government used to improve the economic conditions of its wards. Where this is the case, the purchase may be considered not subject to State taxation under the principle that the State, through the use of its taxing power, cannot hinder or interfere with an instrumentality of the Federal Government.

After noting the fact that personal property purchased by Indians with restricted funds and property issued to the Indians by the Government are Government instrumentalities, and that property purchased by the Indians pursuant to a specific plan for economic rehabilitation approved by the Government and carried out under Government supervision should likewise be recognized as a Government instrumentality, the opinion continues with a review of the authorities on the question of whether a state tax upon the acquisition of such property places an unconstitutional burden upon a Federal instrumentality and concludes:

The Supreme Court has held that the application of a State tax on the selling of gasoline to sales of gasoline to the United States is unconstitutional as placing a direct burden on the Federal Government. Purdie Oil Co. v. Mississippi, 277 U. S. 218, Graves v. Texas Co., 298 U. S. 803. However, in James v. Davis Contracting Co., 302 U. S. 318, the Supreme Court said that the Purdie and Graves cases, while being distinguished and should be limited to their particular facts. In the James case a State tax on the gross proceeds of a contractor on Government work was held constitutional as having only an indirect effect on the Federal Government. That case is representative of the recent Supreme Court cases tending to restrain the tax immunity of agencies of Government where the burden on the Government was not clear and direct. Hettinger v. Mountain Products Corp., 303 U. S. 370, Hettinger v. Gravelly, 304 U. S. 406.

Although the law on the question is in a state of flux, the proper holding at the present time is, in my opinion, that where purchases are made either by the Indians themselves or by Government agents in carrying out a specific economic program for the Indians approved and supervised by the Federal Government, or where such purchases are made with restricted funds, the purchases are not subject to the State sales taxes even though they are made off the reservation.

SUMMARY

1 Persons trading with the Indians on Indian reservations are not subject to the Arizona sales tax laws. However, where such traders are non-Indians, they are subject to the sales tax laws on so much of their business as is carried on with other non-Indians. Traders off an Indian reservation are subject to the State sales tax laws, whether or not they are Indians or dealing with Indians.

2 Purchases made by Indians on Indian reservations are not subject to the Arizona sales taxes nor are purchases made by Indians or Government agents off the reservation where they are made with restricted funds or in carrying out a specific program for the economic rehabilitation of the Indians approved and supervised by the Federal Government.

In another recent opinion of the Solicitor of the Interior Department the application of certain state taxes to sales of tobacco and gasoline to the Menominee Indian Mills was considered. The state taxes in question were (1) the State excise tax on the sales of gasoline, levied under chapter 78 of the Wisconsin Statutes of 1917, and (2) the State occupational tax on the sale of tobacco products, levied under chapters 443 and 518 of the Laws of Wisconsin, 1939.

After a searching analysis of the problems presented, the Solicitor made a twofold finding, to wit:

1 State gasoline sales taxes (a) do not apply to sales of gasoline to the Menominee Indian Mills for use in the operation of the mills, but (b) do apply to sales of gasoline to the mills for resale through the commissary of the mills to employees and the general public. This latter ruling was occasioned by the fact that title IV of the Internal Revenue Act of 1932 and the regulations issued thereunder exempted from the operation of the tax only gasoline sold "for the exclusive use of the United States."

2 The state tax on the selling of tobacco products does not apply to the selling of such products by the commissary of the Menominee Indian Mills to employees and the general public.

SECTION 6. STATE INHERITANCE TAXES

There appears to be meager authority on the question of the liability of an Indian's estate to the payment of state inheritance taxes. The only case to reach the Supreme Court involved allotted lands of a restricted full-blood Quapaw Indian which had been declared inalienable for a period of 25 years by the Act of March 2, 1895.¹ By the Act of June 25, 1910,² the Secretary of the Interior was directed to determine the heirs of deceased allottees according to state statutes of descent. According to the state statute the land herein involved descended to two full-blood Quapaws. The state auditor of Oklahoma attempted to subject the lands to the state inheritance tax. Upon appeal the Supreme Court declared:

Apparently appellant supposed that the lands passed to the heirs by virtue of the laws of the State and were subject to the inheritance taxes which she laid. He accordingly demanded the payment of appellees and threatened enforcement by summary process and sale of the lands. The court below held that the State had no right to demand the taxes and restrained appellant from attempting to collect them.

The duty of the Secretary of the Interior to determine the heirs according to the State law of descent is not questioned. Congress provided that the lands should be send and directed how the heirs should be ascertained. It adopted the provisions of the Oklahoma Statute as an expression of its own will—the laws of Missouri in Kansas, at any other State, might have been accepted. The lands really passed under a law of the United States, and not in Oklahoma's possession.

It must be accepted as established that during the trust or restricted period Congress has power to control lands within a State which have been duly allotted to Indians by the United States and thereafter conveyed through trust in restrictive patents. "It is essential to the proper discharge of their duty to a dependent people, and the means or instrumentalities utilized therein cannot be subjected to taxation by the State without assent of the federal government." 1P 579.

SECTION 7. FEDERAL TAXATION

A SOURCES OF LIMITATIONS

While the tax which was declared invalid in *Choate v. Trapp*¹¹ was payable to the State of Oklahoma, the question to which the Supreme Court addressed its primary attention in that case was the validity of the congressional enactment which purportedly subjected the land to state taxation. In holding that Congress had no power to subject the land to taxation after agreement in exchange for a valuable consideration, that the land should be tax-exempt, the Supreme Court evinced and went far to support a rule which would lay limits upon federal taxation as well as upon state taxation. Thus it in circumstances similar to those exemplified in Choate v. Trapp, the Federal Government, pursuant to an agreement with an Indian tribe, issues a trust patent promising clear title to the patentee after a fixed period, it seems probable that any attempt, for example, to impose a federal inheritance tax upon such land would be held invalid by the Fifth Amendment.

Nevertheless, in the only Supreme Court case in which the constitutionality of a federal law violating an agreement with an Indian tribe was considered, the case of The Cherokee Tobacco,¹² the Supreme Court held that the violation of a treaty provision by an act of Congress presented a purely political question which the courts were powerless to remedy. This doctrine would, of course, preclude the relief which the Supreme Court gave in Choate v. Trapp.

It seems clear, then, that the holding in Choate v. Trapp is inconsistent with the doctrine of The Cherokee Tobacco, and that the holding in that case is incompatible with the doctrine of Choate v. Trapp. The opinion in the later case does not attempt to distinguish the earlier case—does not even mention the earlier case. It is easy to make verbal distinctions, to say that The Cherokee Tobacco involved a question of the plenary power of Congress over tribal affairs and that Choate v. Trapp involved individual property rights. But one might as easily say that plenary power of Congress over tribal affairs was involved in Choate v. Trapp, since all the legislation in that case dealt with tribes, and that the individual rights of the Indian Bins Bondurant in The Cherokee Tobacco, which in fact Congress itself called upon to recognize and compensate 4 years after the Supreme Court decision,¹³ were even more individual than the rights of the 8,000 plaintiff members of the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes in Choate v. Trapp. To say that property rights existed in one case and not in the other is to describe the result rather than to explain it or to aid in predicting future decisions.¹⁴

Whether the Choate case overruled the case of The Cherokee Tobacco, and sic, or whether the doctrine of the earlier case is to prevail outside the narrow fact situation presented in the Choate case, the future will determine. Some support is given to the latter hypothesis by the consideration that the decision of the Supreme Court in Choate v. Trapp was unanimous, while that in The Cherokee Tobacco was a four-to-two decision with three members of the court not hearing argument.¹⁵

In recent years Congress has occasionally made certain that no claim to permanent tax exemption would arise, by specifying that designated Indian property should be "non-taxable until otherwise directed by Congress."¹⁶

B FEDERAL INCOME TAXES

In considering federal taxation of Indian income, one finds the courts concerned not, as in the case of the state, with the question of whether the state may tax, but with the question of whether the Federal Government has intended to tax. Whether it has done so in a particular case depends on the construction accorded the taxing statute by the courts. The rule of construction most recently announced¹⁷ is that the federal income tax law, applying as it does to the income of "every individual" and to income derived "from any source whatever," includes within its application Indians and their income unless they are by agreement or statute exempted.

It is clear that the exemption accorded tribal and restricted Indian lands extends to the income derived directly therefrom.¹⁸ Accordingly, rents, royalties, and other income of Quapaw,¹⁹ Ojibwa,²⁰ Ojibwa and Mescalero,²¹ and Ponca²² Indians have been held tax-exempt. Likewise, the income derived by individual Indians as then share in the oil or mineral deposits in tribal lands has been held tax-exempt.²³

¹¹ "The case of the Cherokee Tobacco Tax, 11 Wall 816, cannot be treated as authority against the conclusion we have reached. The decision only disposed of that case, as three of the judges of the court did not sit in it and two dissented from the judgment announced by the other four." *United States v. Conversely, income which is derived from unrestricted lands has been held taxable,¹²⁶ and the Circuit Court of Appeals has held that upon the death of a restricted Creek allottee, his surplus allotment having been freed of restrictions by the Act of May 27, 1908,¹²⁷ the income therefrom was taxable in the hands of a nonmember son although income from the homestead which remained restricted was not taxable.¹²⁸ It has been held, too, by the United States Supreme Court¹²⁹ that where an Indian holds a certificate of competency the income paid to him as royalties from oil and gas leases is taxable. And the income of a Hopi Indian derived from his commercial business in trading with other Indians and from the sale of cattle given him by the Government is taxable.¹³⁰

Though income derived directly from restricted allotted lands is exempt from federal income taxation, so-called reinvestment income is subject to such taxation.¹³¹ The case of Superintendent Pitt v. United States v. Commissioner,¹³² involved the taxability of the income of a nonmember Indian derived from the reinvestment of income from restricted allotted lands. The court there said that the taxation of the income from trust property of its Indian wards by the Federal Government, under federal revenue acts general in scope, is not so inconsistent with the relationship between the Government and its Indian wards that exemption is a necessary implication, and held that reinvestment income is clearly taxable under the federal revenue laws.¹³³

It has been held that the income of a non-Indian lessee derived from a lease of restricted Indian lands is subject to the federal income tax.¹³⁴

The courts in considering an Indian claim for refund of taxes erroneously paid, have looked upon an unrestricted Indian claimant as upon any other taxpayer. Thus an unrestricted Indian member of the Choctaw Tribe of Indians is not entitled to a refund of taxes erroneously paid upon income from tax-exempt lands where no claim for refund was filed until after the running of the statute of limitations.¹³⁵ But there is no limitation on refund to restricted Indians if (1) a tax was assessed against them on taxable income, and (2) such tax was paid by an Indian superintendent, at other such officer of the United States, out of funds in his possession belonging eventually to his ward.¹³⁶

Provision has been made by public resolution¹³⁷ for the allowance of claims for refund of taxes erroneously or illegally collected from a duly enrolled member of an Indian tribe who received in pursuance of a treaty or agreement with the United States an allotment of land which by the terms of said treaty or agreement was exempted from taxation, notwithstanding his failure to file a claim for refund within the time prescribed by law. A recent statute¹³⁸ similar in nature to the foregoing resolution, has expressly stated that it is not the policy of the Government to make or read the statute of limitations in order to escape its obligation to its Indian wards.

C OTHER FEDERAL TAXES

By section 617 of title 4 of the Revenue Act of 1925,¹³⁹ an excise tax was levied on sales of gasoline. In considering the application of this tax to sales of gasoline to the Menominee Indian Mills, the Solicitor of the Interior Department in a recent opinion¹⁴⁰ made the following finding, to wit:

1. Federal gasoline sales taxes (a) do not apply to sales of gasoline to the Menominee Indian Mills for use in the operation of the mills, but (b) do apply to sales of gasoline to the mills for resale through the commissary of the mills to employees and the general public. This latter ruling was occasioned by the fact that title 4 of the Internal Revenue Act of 1922 and the regulations issued thereunder exempted from the operation of the tax only gasoline sold "for the exclusive use of the United States."

From an early date Congress has expressly provided that no duty shall be levied or collected from Indians on the importation of peltries brought by them into the territories of the United States¹⁴¹ and the desire to encourage native Indian handicrafts has been clearly evidenced by the express exemption from the operation of the Revenue Act of 1932¹⁴² of "any article of native Indian handicraft manufactured or produced by Indians on Indian reservations, or in Indian schools, or by Indians under the jurisdiction of the United States Government in Alaska."

SECTION 8. TRIBAL TAXATION

As distinct political communities, the Indian tribes possess some of the attributes of sovereignty, among which is the power to legislate regarding their internal relations.¹³⁵ Thus power, with certain exceptions, includes the power to levy local taxes on all property within tribal limits, belonging to members of the tribe.¹³⁶ Though the scope of the power as applied to nonmembers is not clear, it extends at least to property of nonmembers used in connection with Indian property as well as to privileges enjoyed by nonmembers in trading with the Indians.¹³⁷ The power to tax nonmembers is derived in the cases from the authority, founded on original sovereignty and guaranteed in some instances by treaties, to remove property of nonmembers from the territorial limit of the tribe. Since the tribal government has the power to exclude, it can exact a fee from nonmembers as a condition precedent to granting permission to remain or to operate within the tribal domain.¹⁴¹ Since, however, the exclusive power to regulate trade with the Indians is vested in the Commissioner of Indian Affairs,¹⁴² it would seem that, in the absence of specific federal authorization, the tribe has no power to tax nontribe traders.¹⁴³

Limitations on the taxing power of the state governments arising from the federal instrumentality doctrine logically also apply to the tribal governments.¹⁴⁴

It would seem that the tribal taxing power is not subject to limitation imposed upon state or federal legislation by the Federal Constitution.¹⁴⁵ In the only Supreme Court case on the point the court recoiled in approving such a tax that the net of the tribal legislation was not arbitrary and did not violate the Federal Constitution.¹⁴⁶

Under section 16 of the Act of June 18, 1934,¹⁴⁷ tribal constitutions containing provisions authorizing taxation of members and nonmembers have been adopted by many tribes and approved by the Secretary of the Interior. Since there is no express grant of taxing power in the act, such power must be traced to tribal sovereignty, the power to exclude, or some federal statute or treaty. Several types of limitations are imposed on the tribal taxing power in the constitutions.

Some of the constitutions provide that taxes may be levied upon members of the tribe without review by the Secretary of the Interior, but that taxes upon nonmembers shall be subject to such review,¹⁴⁸ and another group provides for general review of all taxing ordinances by the Secretary.¹⁴⁹ Still another group provides that an assessment upon members of the tribe shall not be effective unless the eligible voters of the tribe approve.¹⁵⁰

Under some of the constitutions, only a per capita tax on eligible voters can be levied.¹⁵¹ One constitution providing for assessments to obtain funds for carrying out any project for the benefit of the community as a whole allows any district not directly benefited by the project to exempt itself from the assessment by a majority vote.¹⁵²

SECTION 1. TRIBAL EXISTENCE

The term "tribe" is commonly used in two senses, an ethnological sense and a political sense. It is important to distinguish between these two meanings of the term.¹ Groups that consist of several ethnological tribes, sometimes speaking different languages, have been recognized as single tribes for administrative and political purposes. Examples are the Fort Belknap Indian Community² (Gros Ventre and Assiniboin), the Cheyenne and Arapahoe Indians of Oklahoma,³ the Cherokee Nation (in which Delaware, Shawnee, and others were assimilated), and the Confederated Salish and Kootenai Tribes of the Flathead Reservation.⁴ Despite the use of the plural "Tribes" in this last case, and other similar cases, the group has been treated, politically, as a single tribe. Likewise what is a single tribe, from the ethnological standpoint, may sometimes be divided into a number of independent tribes in the political sense. Examples of this situation are offered by the Sioux, the Cheyenne, and the Shawnee.

The question of tribal existence, in the legal or political sense, has generally arisen in determining whether some legislative, administrative, or judicial power with respect to Indian "tribes" extended to a particular group of Indians.

The most basic of these issues has been the constitutional issue arising from the grant of power to Congress to regulate "commerce with . . . the Indian Tribes."⁵ The Supreme Court has, in a number of cases, taken the position that the applicability or constitutionality of congressional legislation affecting individual Indians, and the unapplicability or unconstitutionality of state legislation affecting such individuals, depended upon whether or not the individuals concerned were living in tribal relations.

While thus linking the validity of congressional and administrative actions depend upon the existence of tribes, the courts have said that it is up to Congress and the executive to determine whether a tribe exists. Thus the "political arm of the Government" would seem to be in a position to determine the extent of its power. In this respect the question of tribal existence and congressional power has been classed as a "political question" along with the recognition of foreign governments and other issues of international relations.⁶

Thus in the case of United States v. Holliday,⁷ the Supreme Court held that federal liquor laws were applicable to a sale of liquor to a Michigan Chippewa Indian, despite a treaty provision looking to the dissolution of the tribe, for the reason that the Interior Department regarded the tribe as still existing. The Court declared:

In reference to all matters of this kind, it is the rule of this court to follow the action of the executive and other political departments of the government, whose duty is specially and only to determine such affairs. If by them those Indians are recognized as a tribe, this court must do the same. (P. 419.)

Again, in the case of The Kansas Indians,⁸ the Supreme Court dealt with the converse situation, involving an attempt to apply state tax laws to Shawnee, Wya, and Miami Indians of Kansas, and held such laws to be unconstitutional on the ground that the tribal relations of these Indians were still recognized by the Interior Department. In this case the Court declared:

If the tribal organization of the Shawnee is preserved intact, and recognized by the political department of the government as existing, then they are a "people distinct from others," capable of making treaties, separated from the jurisdiction of Kansas, and to be governed exclusively by the government of the Union. . . . (Conferring rights and privileges on these Indians cannot affect their situation, which can only be changed by treaty stipulation, or a voluntary abandonment of their tribal organization. As long as the United States recognizes their national character they are under the protection of treaties and the laws of Congress, and their property is withdrawn from the operation of State laws. In the case of Chippewa Indians v. United States,¹ the power of Congress over Chippewa lands was challenged on the theory that the tribe had been dissolved and the lands individualized, and that Congress had therefore no right to expend the funds for various tribal purposes. In rejecting this argument, the Supreme Court put its criterion of tribal existence in these terms:

It is true that, prior to the adoption of the Act of 1889, the tribe had been broken up into numerous lands, some of which held Indian title to lands in the State of Minnesota. The Act refers to these collectively as "the Chippewas in the State of Minnesota." Whether or not the tribal relation had been dissolved prior to its adoption, the Act contemplates future dealings with the Indians upon a tribal basis. It exhibits a purpose gradually to extinguish the Indians and to bring about a status comparable to that of citizens of the United States. But it is plain that, in the interim, Congress did not intend to surrender its guardianship over the Indians or treat them otherwise than as tribal Indians.

This is evidenced by a series of acts, the first of which was adopted nineteen months after the Act of 1889, which are inconsistent with the view that the Congress considered the Indians as emancipated or intended to enter into a binding contract with them as individuals. (Citing holdings.) Many of these statutes refer to the Chippewas of Minnesota as a tribe. (Citing statutes.) Moreover, an examination of the Act of 1889 discloses that it is not cast in the form of an agreement, and we may not assume that Congress abandoned its guardianship of the tribe or the lands and entered into a formal trust agreement with the Indians, in the absence of a clear expression of that intent. (Pp. 4-5)

Issues similar to the above have been raised in many other cases, and determined in accordance with the foregoing principles.²

The limits of legislative power in this field were suggested in the opinion written by Mr. Justice Van Devanter, for a unanimous court, in United States v. Sandoz:³

Of course, it is not meant by that Congress may bring a community or body of people within the range of this power by arbitrarily calling them an Indian tribe, but only that in respect of distinctly Indian communities the question whether, to what extent, and for what time they shall be recognized and dealt with as dependent tribes, requiring the guardianship and protection of the United States are to be determined by Congress, and not by the courts. (T. 46)

Aside from those cases which have dealt with the term "Indian tribes" as used in the Constitution, there have been a few statutes which have used the term and about which legal questions of tribal existence have been raised.

One such statute is that regulating the purchase or leasing of land "from any Indian nation or tribe of Indians."⁴ Under this statute a state court decree partitioning Oneida Indian lands in New York, based upon the theory that the Oneidas in New York had ceased to exist as a tribe, was set aside. The federal court held that the Oneidas of New York still existed as a tribe, in the eyes of the Federal Government, and that it was for Congress, and not the state courts, to say when this tribal existence was at an end.⁵

A similar holding with respect to the Pueblos of New Mexico is elsewhere discussed.⁶

Questions of tribal existence were extensively litigated under the Indian Dependent Act of 1891,⁷ which gave to the Court of Claims jurisdiction over "all claims for property of citizens of the United States taken or destroyed by Indians belonging to any band, tribe, or nation, in amity with the United States, without just cause or provocation on the part of the owner or agent in charge, and not returned or paid for." Under the statute it became necessary, in each case, to determine whether the land or title to which the offender belonged was in amity with the United States.⁸

The question of tribal existence presented little difficulty under the 1891 Act where the group in question had entered into treaty relations with the United States, or where a separate reservation had been set aside for the group." A more difficult question, however, was presented in cases where a portion of a tribe went on the warpath. In this situation the rule was established that if the hostile party constituted a distinct band the original tribe was not responsible for its depredations.¹² In the case of Montana v. United States,¹³ the Supreme Court upheld the rule laid down by the Court of Claims and sought to establish working definitions of the terms "tribe" and "band," in these words:

We are now concerned in this case with the meaning of the words "tribe" and "band." By a "tribe" we understand a body of Indians of the same or a similar race, united in a community under one leadership or government and inhabiting a particular though sometimes ill-defined territory, by a "band," a company of Indians not necessarily, though often of the same race or tribe, but united under the same leadership in a common design. While a "band" does not imply the separate racial origin characteristic of a tribe, of which it is usually an offshoot, it does imply a leadership and a concept of action. How large the company must be to constitute a "band" within the meaning of the act it is unnecessary to decide. It may be doubtful whether it requires more than independence of action, continuity of existence, a common leadership and control of action. (P. 200.)

In the parallel case of Conner v. United States,¹⁴ the Supreme Court declared:

To constitute a "band" we do not think it necessary that the Indians composing it be a separate political entity, recognized as such, inhabiting a particular territory, and with whom treaties had been or might be made. These peculiarities would rather give them the character of tribes. The word "band" implies an inferior and less permanent organization, though it must be of sufficient strength to be capable of initiating hostile proceedings. (P. 275.)

In the case of Dobbs v. United States,¹⁵ the Court of Claims declared:

It has been urged in this and other cases that when a number of Indian tribes have been removed to a reservation the tribal unity of each ceases, that they become in legal effect one tribe and that the question of unity must be directed to all of the Indians thus banded together.

In dealing with the question of the unity of such a tribe as a band of the Apaches, the court has been more and more compelled to fall back upon the purpose of the earlier statutes, which created a liability and gave to these Indians their right of action. That purpose, as has been said before, was to keep the peace in present Indian warfare upon the frontier. The Government said both to the white man and to the Indians, "This depredation or this outrage is wrong, is indefensible, and you shall be indemnified for your loss so far as property is involved, provided always that you refrain from war." If the transaction and the Indians did not comply with the simple condition, if the purpose of the statute was not effective, the Indians have no right to seek it under the act of 1891.

The practical question, then, is, Who were the Indians whose unity was to be maintained? Who were the Indians so inhibited by the legislation in fact that the depredations might reasonably be regarded as a part of them and they be treated as a body whose unity it was desirable to maintain?

In dealing with this question the court has held, first, that a nation, tribe or band will be regarded as an Indian entity whose the relations of the Indians in their organized or tribal capacity has been fixed and recognized by treaty; second, that where there is no treaty by which the Government has recognized a body of Indians, the court will recognize a subdivision of tribes or bands which has been recognized by these officers of the Government whose duty it was to deal with and report the condition of the Indians to the legislative branch; third, the Government, third, that where there has been no such recognition in the Government, the court will accept the subdivision into tribes or bands made by the Indians themselves. (Pratt v. The Apache Indians, 32 C. Cl. R. 1.)

But in the application of this rule the court has had to go further and recognize bands which simply in fact existed, irrespective of recognition, either by the Department of the Interior or the Indian tribes from which the members of the band came. Where the band of Apaches was merely a combination of individuals from different bands associated together for the purpose of warring against the United States. The band did not exist until its warfare began. It had no geographical home or Indian. A furious sense of injustice induced the Indians to prefer death to submission, and they sought the troops of the United States until the band and its members were extinct. (Montana v. The Menaville Apaches, 32 Id. 349.)

The Chiricahuas were an isolated mountain band, they had their own habitat in remote valleys distinct from the valleys of mountains of the other bands; they fought their own battles, they pursued their own policy, they were hunted down and captured as Chiricahuas and were brought in and placed upon a reservation as a distinct and well-known military enemy. On the reservation they remained distinct, neither in fact nor in a legal sense merging with the other tribes of their antithesis and escape from the San Carlos Reservation, in 1881, they still retained their tribal distinctness. For the court to hold that they had become an integral part of all the Indians upon the reservation, and that all of the Indians upon the reservation, little better than prisoners of war, had become a new, fictitious Indian nation or tribal organization would be to introduce a new and artificial element into this branch of litigation founded not on the facts of the case but on a speculative theory. (Pp. 515-517.)

The question of what groups constitute tribes or bands has been extensively considered in recent years by the administrative authorities of the Federal Government in connection with tribal organization effected pursuant to section 16 of the Act of June 18, 1934.¹⁶ A showing that the group seeking to organize is entitled to be considered as a tribe, within the meaning of the act,¹⁷ is deemed a prerequisite to the holding of a referendum on

S. 271 (1901). In the case of Herring v. United States and the Indians, the Court of Claims held that while the tribe was in unity with the United States, the members of Black Hawk's band had separated themselves from the tribe in order to engage in hostile acts, so that neither the tribe nor the band was liable for the depredations which had been committed, the tribe being immune because not involved, the band immune because engaged in war. The Court declared:

A band, being the lowest and smallest subdivision, constitutes more readily than any other form of corporate existence, so to speak and may be composed of Indians of different tribes or nations, and becoming a de facto band by the extent of its membership, its continuity of existence and its persistent cohesion subject to the control and power of a leader having the recognized authority of a commander and chief.

The different divisions of the Indians have not usually originated from the conventional mode which organizes whole nations into political communities, but have originated as a condition in fact and, when so existing, they are recognized by the laws and treaties as a separate entity, and hold responsible as such. ¹⁸ Sec 16 of the act covers "any Indian tribe, or tribes residing on the same reservation." U. S. 19 defines "tribe" as follows: "The term 'tribe' whenever used in this Act shall be construed to refer to any Indian tribe, organized band, pueblo, or the Indians residing on one reservation." Critical cases arise particularly where the last phrase is applicable. Where this phrase is applicable, and the Indians of a given reservation a proposed tribal constitution, and the basis for such a holding is regularly set forth in the letter from the Commissioner at Indian Affairs to the Secretary of the Interior recommending the submission of a tribal constitution to a referendum vote. In cases of special difficulty, a ruling has generally been obtained from the Solicitor for the Interior Department as to the tribal status of the group seeking to organize. The considerations which, singly or jointly, have been particularly relied upon in reaching the conclusion that a group constitutes a "tribe" or "band" have been:

- (1) That the group has had treaty relations with the United States.
- (2) That the group has been denominated a tribe by act of Congress or Executive order.
- (3) That the group has been treated as having collective rights in tribal lands or funds, even though not expressly designated a tribe.
- (4) That the group has been treated as a tribe or band by other Indian tribes.¹⁴
- (5) That the group has exercised political authority over its members, through a tribal council or other governmental units.¹⁵

Other factors considered, though not conclusive, are the existence of special appropriation items for the group¹⁶ and the social solidarity of the group.

Ethnological and historical considerations, although not conclusive, are entitled to great weight in determining the question of tribal existence. A situation of peculiar difficulty and complexity arose in connection with the application of two tribal towns of the Creek Nation to organize under the Oklahoma Indian Welfare Act. In upholding the tribal status of the applicants, the Solicitor for the Interior Department declared:

For the information of the Solicitor's Office an anthropological report, compiled by Mr. Morris Opler, was submitted which dealt with the history and present character of these towns. This report provided data and opinions of authorities on the Creeks showing that the Creeks were originally a confederacy composed of a number of tribes, each referred to as a "Tulwa". This word was generally translated into the English word "town" but rather covers the conception contained in the word "tribe". Each Tulwa was self-governing. It was composed of people living in a single locality. Membership was dependent on birth rather than residence since a Creek Indian belonged to the Tulwa of his mother. These towns were originally recognized by the Federal Government as the governing units in the Creek confederacy. The treaties of 1790 and 1796 with the Creeks were signed by the representatives of the various towns.¹⁷ However, because of the presence of the white people for land and the fact that the towns declared war and peace independently of each other, the Federal authorities found it advisable to insist upon centralization of the Creeks to avoid dealing with each Tulwa. The Indians opposed this centralization and it was not until after the Civil War, in which the towns took opposing positions, that the Federal Government achieved the formation of a single government among the Creek Indians. And even then the union was opposed by the full blood element. In spite of the centralization, however, the towns were still used for the official purposes of census and annuity payments and as a basis for representation in the central body. The census was kept on the basis of these towns until the making of the allotment rolls by the Dawes Commission. It was thought that the allotting of the Creek Indians would destroy their town organization but this did not in fact occur as the members of the town took allotments in the same locality and continued their social and political organization. The report states that at the present time the same officers described by members of the Dr. Soto's expedition are still maintained. Many of the old traditions and distinctions between the towns are likewise maintained, including the traditional membership.

There is other evidence besides the report of this anthropologist now available which indicates the tribal character of these towns. The federated government formed in the latter part of the nineteenth century was a modified replica of the United States government, with representatives elected from the self-governing towns to the two Houses of legislature, the House of Kings and the House of Warriors. These representatives elected the Creek delegation of the chiefs and bandmen of the towns. The present Principal Chief of the Creek Nation has informed the office that these elections will continue, though the National Council has few functions, and that the towns still have their kings and warriors. This institution for an election connected with one of the constitutions and the provisions of the constitutions themselves show the existence of a fully elaborate local organization with a chief, governing committee and various special offices. Some towns have a square dedicated by their members used for meetings, ceremonies and social functions and there is at least one circle of communal ground, also given by the members, worked by them to the benefit of indigent persons in the town. The principal Chief reports various ways in which the towns are active in providing assistance and relief to the members of the town.

That the Indians themselves recognized the existence of the Creek tribal towns is clear from an examination of the constitution and laws of the Muskogean Nation.

Under the foregoing legal authorities it appears to me that the Creek towns can buy a substantial claim to the right to be considered as recognized bands within the meaning of section 8 of the Oklahoma Indian Welfare Act of June 28, 1906.¹⁸

It is not enough, however, to show that any of the foregoing elements existed at some time in remote past. As was said by the Solicitor in passing upon the status of the Miami and Peoria Indians under the Oklahoma Indian Welfare Act:¹⁹

It is not enough that the ethnographic history of the two groups shows them in the past to have been distinct and well-recognized tribes or bands. A particular tribe or band may well pass out of existence as such in the course of time. The word "organization" as used in the Oklahoma Indian Welfare Act involves more than past organize and adopt a constitution under sec. 16, it has been administratively held that they thereby become a tribe, but do not thereby acquire nonstatutory powers of government which they have never exercised. See Chapter 7, in Op.

¹⁴The case of Tully v. United States, 32 C. Cls 1 (1896), indicates that where the Indians themselves have treated a group as a band separate from or subordinate to a given tribe, the courts will accept the subdivisions so recognized.

The policy of the United States in dealing with the Indians has been, as we understand, to accept the subdivisions of the Indians into such tribes or bands as the Indians themselves adopted, and to treat with them accordingly.

So that if such subdivisions, whether into tribes or bands, have not been recognized by treaty, but have been by the action of the Government whose duty it was to report in respect thereto, then the court will accept that as sufficient recognition of the tribe or band upon which to predicate a judgment.

Or if there be no such recognition by the Government, then the court will accept the subdivisions into such tribes or bands as made by the Indians themselves, whether such tribes and bands be named by reason of their geographical location or otherwise (Op. 7 and 8).

¹⁵See, for an example of the consideration given to the foregoing elements of tribal existence, Memo Sol. I. D., February 8, 1897 (Mole Lake and St. Croix Chippewas).

¹⁶This appears to be given considerable weight by the Court in Claims in McKee v. United States and Comanche Indians, 35 C. Cls 90, 104 (1897).

existence as a tribe and its historical recognition as such. There must be a currently existing group distinct and functioning as a group in certain respects and recognition of such activity must have been shown by specific actions of the Indian Office, the Department, or by Congress."

The distinction between a band or tribe and a voluntary association or society is at times difficult to draw with precision. The Acting Solicitor for the Interior Department, ruling that a particular group could not be considered a tribe or band for purposes of organization under the Oklahoma Indian Welfare Act,¹ declined

The primary distinction between a band and a society is that a band is a political body. In other words, a band has functions and powers of government. It is generally the historic unit of government in these tribes whose bands exist. Because of Federal intervention aimed to destroy tribal organization many recognized bands have lost most if not all of their governmental functions. But their identity as a political organization must remain if the group of Indians can be considered a band or tribe.

This character of a band as an existing or historical unit of Indian government seems to be recognized in sections 16 and 19 of the Indian Reorganization Act which refer to "bands, vested in any tribe or tribal council by existing law," and define tribe to include an "organized band." In the administration of the act, or continuities of tribes or bands have included such

SECTION 2. TERMINATION OF TRIBAL EXISTENCE

Given adequate evidence of the existence of a tribe during some period in the remote or recent past, the question may always be raised: Has the existence of this tribe been terminated in some way?

Generally speaking, the termination of tribal existence is shown positively by act of Congress, treaty provision, or tribal action,³ or negatively by the cessation of collective action and collective recognition. The forms of such collective action and collective recognition which are considered criteria of tribal existence have already been discussed.

The law was once widely entertained that tribal membership was legally incompatible with United States citizenship. "When a number of early treaties and statutes provided that a given tribe should be dissolved when its members became citizens."⁴ Dissolution of the tribe required division of property, and this meant allotment of tribal funds and per capita division of tribal funds.⁵

The Supreme Court in Matter of Heff,⁶ took the view that citizenship and allotment involved a termination of tribal relations, and that such termination of tribal relations removed citizen allottees from the scope of the Indian liquor laws.

The defendant in the case was a Kickapoo Indian, and the Treaty of June 28, 1842, with that tribe⁷ had provided that upon allotment these Indians "shall cease to be members of said tribe, and shall become citizens of the United States." This provision provides a possible justification for the actual decision in Matter of Heff, but the opinion in the case put the decision upon the broader ground that under section 6 of the General Allotment

Act powers of government as tribal and are considered appropriate. It is this feature which distinguishes organization under section 8 of the Oklahoma Act from organization of voluntary associations under section 4.⁸

The question of tribal existence has generally been treated by the courts as a simple res-quo-quo question. It remains true, however, that an Indian tribe may "cease" for certain purposes, and not for others. Where several Indian groups are considered a single tribe generally for political and administrative purposes, Congress may nevertheless assign tribal status to a component group for specified purposes. This has frequently occurred in connection with claims. Tribe A and Tribe B have amalgamated to form Tribe C and share a common reservation and common funds. But at some time prior to amalgamation, Tribe A had suffered some injury for which a later generation offers redress in the form of a jurisdictional act. In such cases, Congress occasionally recognizes as a tribe, entitled to being suit in the Court of Claims, what is for most purposes only a part of a tribe.⁹

Act, which provides that allottees shall be citizens of the United States "entitled to all the rights, privileges, and immunities of such citizens," every allottee became emancipated from federal control.

This doctrine was rejected in the case of United States v. Ayc,¹⁰ which held that allotment did not terminate tribal existence so as to take allottees outside the scope of Indian liquor laws adopted pursuant to congressional power to regulate commerce with Indian tribes. The Supreme Court declared:

We recognize that a different construction was placed upon section 6 of the act of 1887 in Matter of Heff, 197 U. S. 488, but after reconsideration of the question in the light of other provisions in the act and of many later enactments we clearly reflecting what was intended by Congress, we are constrained to hold that the decision in that case is not well grounded, and it is accordingly overruled. (2, 603.)

The view taken in the Ayc case has prevailed ever since.¹¹

While it is thus clear that neither allotment nor citizenship,¹² per se, nor both together, imply a termination of tribal existence, in the absence of express provision of treaty or statute asserting such a result, usually these are factors to be considered

To maintain that the United States intended, by a change of "the fundamental law, which was not ratified by these tribes, to change upon the United States population of national obligations, rights, and duties, and thereby dissolve tribal relations, whose claims were thus annulled are too weak to enforce their ship and protection of this Government. in determining whether a given group has ceased to maintain tribal relations. Other factors considered by courts and administrative authorities in determining whether the tribal relations of a given group have come to an end are: the physical separation of a group from the main body of the tribe, and the cessation of participation in tribal resources and tribal government.

In the case of The Cherokee Trust Funds,⁴² it was held that those Cherokees who remained in North Carolina when the main body of the Cherokees were removed to Indian Territory thereby lost their tribal status. The Supreme Court declared:

• • • Whatever union they have had among themselves has been merely a social or business one. It was formed in 1868, at the suggestion of an officer of the Indian office, for the purpose of enabling them to transact business with the Government with greater convenience. Although its articles are drawn in the form of a constitution for a separate civil government, they have never been recognized as a separate Nation in the United States, nor treaty has been made with them, they carry no laws, they are citizens of that State and bound by its laws. (P. 300)

As the Court of Claims pointed out in this case, the nonmigrating Cherokees had expatriated themselves from the Cherokee Nation. • • • The only privilege ever accorded to them by the nation was that they might be one citizen and subject upon removal within its territorial boundaries. • • •

It has been administratively determined that those Choctaws remaining in Mississippi when the Choctaw Tribe removed to Indian Territory lost their tribal status and could not be recognized as a separate tribe,⁴³ and, similarly, that the Indians of the Georgetown or Shawnee Reservation in Washington, all of whom, apparently, took allotments at other reservations or otherwise abandoned the reservation in question, could no longer be recognized as a separate tribe entitled to the use of receipts from timber sales on the Georgetown Reservation.⁴⁴

Many of the attempts made by Congress to terminate the existence of particular tribes have proved abortive. Tribes which have been dissolved not once but several times have been recognized, in later congressional legislation, as still existing.

An example in point is the group of Winnebago Indians who, separating from their brothers in Nebraska, took up homestead allotments in Wisconsin, under the Act of March 3, 1875,⁴⁵ which provided for the issuance of homestead allotments to Indians upon proof of the abandonment of tribal relations. The intent of those Indians "to abandon their tribal relations and adopt the habits and customs of civilized people" was given special legislative confirmation in the Act of January 18, 1881.⁴⁶ Nevertheless, in many subsequent statutes Congress recognized the continued existence of the Winnebago Indians of Wisconsin as a separate band.⁴⁷ In 1937 the right of this group to organize as a separate band was affirmed by the Interior Department.⁴⁸

The efforts of Congress to terminate the existence of the Five Civilized Tribes are elsewhere discussed.⁴⁹

The efforts to terminate the existence of the Wyandotte Tribe apparently began in 1870 in a treaty by which that tribe, having "manifested an anxious desire to extinguish their tribal or national character and become citizens of the United States," agreed "that their existence, as a nation or tribe, shall terminate and become extinct upon the ratification of this treaty." • • • The treaty was ratified on September 24, 1870. Apparently the extinguisher clause did not work, for another treaty containing similar provisions for the extinguishment of tribal existence was entered into by the supposedly nonexistent tribe some 5 years later.⁵⁰ In 1873, Congress again provided for the final distribution of the funds belonging to the Wyandotte Tribe.⁵¹ Even this apparently did not interfere with the continued functioning of the tribe, and on July 24, 1887, the chief of the tribe testified that the members of the tribe in a unanimous vote had adopted a tribal constitution under the Oklahoma Indian Welfare Act,⁵² perpetuating the traditional tribal organization.

Various other attempts to terminate tribal relations by treaty or act of Congress have proved abortive.⁵³ These legislative experiences suggest that the dissolution of tribal existence is easier to decree than to effect, and indicate the value of a certain skepticism in considering current legislative proposals looking to the dissolution of all or some Indian tribes. They also point to the reasons, for the judicial rule that an exercise of the federal power to dissolve a tribe must be demonstrated by statutory or treaty provisions which are positive and unambiguous.⁵⁴

SECTION 3. POLITICAL STATUS

The political status of Indian tribes may be considered with respect to the relations subsisting between the tribe and (a) its members, (b) other governments, and (c) private persons not members of the tribe.

(a) So far as concerns the political relation between a tribe and its members, this is a subject which has already been considered in treating of the nature and scope of tribal self-government.⁵⁵

⁵⁵ See Chapter 7.

(b) The relation of an Indian tribe to other governments presents a series of difficult problems of international law. These problems involve (1) The treaty-making capacity of an Indian tribe, (2) the capacity of a tribe to wage war, (3) its capacity to sue as a "foreign nation", (4) its relationship to a foreign country (5) the recognition which it may demand of the several states, (6) its relation to the federal power of eminent domain, (7) its relation to the state power of eminent domain, and (8) its status as a federal instrumentality.

(1) The Indian tribes were recognized as powers capable of making treaties with the United States.¹² The validity of the many treaties made and ratified between the United States and nearly all the tribes within its boundaries, is clearly established, as a matter of law.¹³ Their making, however, depends upon the will of two parties, and either the United States or an Indian tribe may refuse, and frequently has refused, to make treaties which the other party desired. Thus, since Congress expressed its opposition to the continued making of treaties with the Indian tribes, in a order which the House of Representatives attached to the Indian Department Appropriation Act of March 3, 1871,¹⁴ the President and the Senate have refused to make such treaties. Whether Congress, which is not the treaty-making department of the Government, has the power thus to lay down a bar to the making of the treaty-making power, viz., the President and the Senate, and whether a treaty made next year with an Indian tribe and constitutionally ratified would be valid or invalid, are probably academic questions. They are also primarily verbal questions. When Congress condemned the use of treaties, it did not prevent the making of treaties with Indian tribes by means of "conventions," "agreements," "charters," and "constitutions." From the standpoint of the Indian tribes, it made little difference what manner of ratification and procedure was incumbent upon the representative of the United States who treated with them.¹⁵

(2) A second fundamental attitude of sovereignty, in international law is the power to make war. This power has been recognized in Indian tribes down to recent times,¹⁶ and there are still on the statute books laws which contemplate the possibility of hostilities by an Indian tribe.¹⁷ The capacity of an Indian tribe to make war involves certain definite consequences for domestic law. Acts which would constitute murder or manslaughter in the absence of a state of war, whether committed by Indians,¹⁸ or by the military forces¹⁹ of the United States, may be justified as acts of war where a state of war exists. Hostile Indians surrendering to armed forces are subject to the disabilities and entitled to the rights of prisoners of war.²⁰ While the existence of a state of war at some time in the past continues to be a current question in Indian litigation, parties only claim litigation if it may be doubted whether the courts would recognize the legal capacity of an Indian tribe to engage in war today.

(3) A third issue in the relations between an Indian tribe and other governments relates to the possibility of suit by an Indian tribe against a state or its citizens in the federal courts.

It was settled in the historic case of *Cherokee Nation v. Georgia*²¹ that the Cherokee Nation was not a foreign state entitled to bring suit in the federal courts against the State of Georgia to restrain the enforcement of unconstitutional laws.²² The Supreme Court, per Marshall, C. J., laid down the classic outlines of the doctrine which has since prevailed.

It is the Cherokee nation a foreign State, in the sense in which that term is used in the constitution.²³ The counsel for the plaintiffs have maintained the affirmative of this proposition with great earnestness and ability. So much of the argument as was intended to prove the character of the Cherokee Nation as a State, as a distinct political society, separated from others, capable of managing its own affairs and governing itself, has, in the opinion of a majority of the judges, been completely succeeded.

A question of much more difficulty remains. Do the Cherokees constitute a foreign state in the sense of the constitution? The counsel have shown conclusively, that they are not a state of the Union, and have insisted that, individually, they are aliens, not owing allegiance to the United States. An aggregate of aliens composing a state must, they say, be a foreign state each individual being foreign, the whole must be foreign.

This argument is unavailing, but we must examine it more closely, before we yield it. The condition of the Indians in relation to the United States, perhaps, unlike that of any other two people in existence. In general, nations not owing a common allegiance, are foreign to each other. The term foreign nations is, with strict propriety, applicable by either to the other. But the relation of the Indians to the United States is marked by peculiar and cardinal distinctions which exist nowhere else. The Indian nation is admitted to compose a part of the United States. In all our maps, geographical treatises, histories, and laws, it is so considered. In all our intercourse with foreign nations, in our commercial regulations, in any attempt at intercourse between Indians and foreign nations, they are considered as within the jurisdictional limits of the United States, subject to many of those restrictions which are imposed upon our own citizens. They acknowledge themselves, in their treaties, to be under the protection of the United States, they admit that the United States alone have the sole and exclusive right of regulating the trade with them, and managing all their affairs as they think proper, and the Cherokees in particular were allowed by the treaty of Hopewell, which preceded the constitution, "to send a deputy of their choice, whenever they think fit, to congress." Treaties were made with some tribes, by the state of New York, under then unsettled construction of the confederation, by which they ceded all their lands to that state, taking back a limited grant to themselves, in which they admit their dependence. Though the Indians are acknowledged to have an unquestionable, and heretofore unquestioned, right to the lands they occupy, until that right shall be extinguished by a voluntary cession to our government, yet it may well be doubted, whether those tribes which reside within the acknowledged boundaries of the United States can, with strict accuracy, be denominated foreign nations. They may, more correctly, perhaps, be denominated domestic dependent nations. They occupy a territory to which we assert a title independent of their will, which must take effect in point of possession, when their right of possession ceases. Meanwhile, they are in a state of pupillage, their relation to the United States resembles that of a ward to his guardian. They look to our government for protection, rely upon its kindness and its power, appeal to it for relief to their wants; and address the president as their great Father. They and their country are considered by foreign nations, as well Warfare among the Indian tribes themselves was long a matter of concern to the Federal Government. See, for example, the Act of July 11, 1812, 4 Stat. 596.

"We should feel some difficulty in considering them as denizens by the term foreign state, were there no other part of the constitution which might shed light on the meaning of these words. But we think that in construing them, considerable aid is furnished by that clause in the eighth section of the third article, which empowers congress to 'regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several states, and with the Indian tribes.' In this clause, they are as clearly comprehended, by a name inappropriate to themselves, from foreign nations, as from the several states, comprehended by the Union."

"The court has bestowed its chief attention on this question, and, after mature deliberation, the majority is of opinion, that an Indian tribe or nation within the United States is not a foreign state, in the sense of the constitution, and cannot maintain a suit in the courts of the United States. (Pp 16-18, 20.)"

(4) It has been held that the relation of dependence existing between an Indian tribe and the Federal Government is not terminated by the flight of the tribe to foreign soil or by its sojourn on such soil for years. Thus the return of a refugee tribe has been demanded of the foreign country in which it was sojourning."

(5) The Indian tribes have been treated, for certain purposes as similar to states, territories, or dependencies of the United States." Thus, in the case of Mackay v. Cozo,¹¹ the Supreme Court held that an administrator appointed by a probate court of the Cherokee Nation occupied the same position as an administrator appointed by any state or territory of the United States. The court declared:

"In some respects they bear the same relation to the federal government as a territory did in its second grade of government, under the ordinance of 1787. Such territory passed its own laws, subject to the approval of congress, and its inhabitants were subject to the constitution and acts of congress. The principal difference consists in the fact that the Cherokees enacted their own laws, under the recognition, approval, and sanction of officers, and pay their own expenses." Thus, however, is no reason why the laws and proceedings of the Cherokee territory, so far as relates to rights claimed under them, should not be placed upon the same footing as other territories in the Union. It is not a territory, but a domestic territory—a territory which originated under our constitution and laws."

By the 11th section of the act of 24th of June, 1812, it is provided "that it shall be lawful for any person or persons to whom letters testamentary or of administration hath been or may hereafter be granted, by the proper authority in any of the United States or the territories thereof, to transmit any suit or action, and to prosecute and receive any debt in the District of Columbia, in the same manner as if the letters testamentary or administration had been granted in the District."

The Cherokee country, we think, may be considered a territory of the United States, within the act of 1812. In no respect can it be considered a foreign State or territory, as it is within our jurisdiction and subject to our laws. (Pp 108-104.)

Again, in the case of Staudt v. Roberts,¹⁴ the question arose whether a federal court might, by injunction, restrain the enforcement of a judgment rendered by the circuit court of the Cherokee Nation and affirmed by the supreme court of that nation, affecting title to land and rights to rentals within the Cherokee Nation. This issue was resolved in favor of the Cherokee Nation by the Circuit Court of Appeals, and the decision was sustained by the Supreme Court. In the opinion of the former court, rendered by Judge Sanborn, it was said:

"The judgments of the courts of these nations, in cases within their jurisdiction, stand on the same footing with those of the courts of the territories of the Union and are entitled to the same faith and credit. (P. 842.)"

A similar decision was reached in the case of Raymond v. Raymond where the validity of a final divorce decree was upheld.

The Interior Department has taken the view that tribal elections are within those provisions of the Hatch Act¹⁵ applicable to 'any election.'"

(6) Again, it is held that an Indian tribe is not exempt from the power of federal eminent domain."

(7) The rule has likewise been established that an Indian tribe is exempt from the eminent domain power of the several states, in the absence of federal legislation subjecting the tribe to such power."

(8) In its relations with state and municipal governments, an Indian tribe is treated for certain purposes as an instrumentality of the Federal Government." Following a ruling of the Attorney General of North Dakota to the effect that a state crop mortgage law did not apply to mortgages made to an Indian tribe, for the reason that such tribe was deemed an "agency" of the United States within the meaning of the statutory exemption, the Interior Department authorized the acceptance of such mortgages as security for revolving fund loans. The Assistant Secretary declared:

"... This Department has previously held in various communications that an Indian tribe, patently where incorporated, is a Federal agency. In the Solicitor's Opinion M 27810, of December 18, 1934, the following statement is made:

"The Indian tribes have long been recognized as vested with governmental powers, subject to limitations imposed by Federal statutes. The powers of an Indian tribe cannot be restricted or controlled by the governments of the several States. The tribe is, therefore, so far as its original absolute sovereignty has been limited, an instrumentality and agency of the Federal Government." (See the recent opinion of this Department, Towers v. Indian Tribes, approved October 25, 1934—M 27781.)

"Various statutes authorize the delegation of new powers of government to the Indian tribes. (See opinion cited above.) The most recent of such the plaintiffs were white men, who by proceedings of questionable legality, had secured a lease to approximately 400 square miles of Creek tribal land. When they proceeded to fence the land, the tribal treasurer and many other Indians of the vicinity rose in protest and destroyed 60 miles of fence, which was as much as the plaintiffs had built. Congress thereafter enacted a statute authorizing the Court of Claims to hear the plaintiffs' claim against the Creek Nation. The Court of Claims finally dismissed the plaintiffs' suit, declaring:

Plaintiffs' petition avers that the damage was inflicted by "a mob of Indians of the Creek or Muskogee Nation in Tribal Land" and it is that by the Creek Nation and is to be held responsible to the mob's action. It can be said of the Creek Nation, as was said of the Cherokee Nation, that it has "many of the rights and privileges of an independent people. They have their own constitution and laws and power to administer their internal affairs. They are recognized as a distinct political community, and treaties have been made with them in that capacity." Delaware Indians v. Cherokee Nation, 193 U. S. 327, 334. They are not sovereign to the extent that the federal or state governments are sovereign, but this suit is predicated upon the assumption that their laws are valid enactments, and it recognizes the separate existence of the Creek Nation. When, therefore, the effort is made to hold them responsible as a nation for the illegal action of a mob we must apply the rule of law applicable to established governments under similar conditions. It is a familiar rule that in the absence of a statute declaring a liability thereon neither the sovereign nor the governmental subdivisions, such as counties or municipalities, are responsible to the party injured in his person or estate by mob violence.⁴⁷ (Pp. 172-173.)

The decision of the Court of Claims, affirmed by the Supreme Court, clearly establishes that an Indian tribe is not a mere collection of individuals, and that the action of a mob, even though it should include all the members of a municipality, is not the action of the municipality.

Under the Act of March 3, 1855,⁴⁸ the Secretary of the Interior was authorized to pass on claims for depredations where the tribe concerned had, by treaty, assumed collective responsibility for the acts of its members. This statute was narrowly construed. The Court of Claims held that in order to bring a case within the terms of the statute it had to be shown that the tribe had expressly undertaken to make compensation for injuries committed by individual members.

While Congress has the undoubted right to provide that an obligation to pay may arise from an act of Congress, the policy of the Government has confined the responsibility of the Indian and the consequent power of the Secretary to the obligation arising from treaties, in which there is an express undertaking on the part of the Indians to pay for depredations.⁴⁹ (P. 22.)

As was said by the Court of Claims, with respect to a depredation suit brought against an Indian tribe under the statute:

The Indian defendants were not liable, for they were a tribe, a quasi body politic, and the trespassers were individuals. There was no mutual right except that of pursuing and proceeding against the depredators individually. They were the only wrongdoers known to the common law—to any law. As against both of the defendants in this suit, the Government and the Cheyenne tribes, the only semblance of liability that existed, or exists, is that which has been expressly declared and created by treaties and statutes.⁵⁰ (P. 470.)

We have already noted that a liability imposed upon Indian tribes a liability for depredations which was statutory and not based upon treaty provisions. While the power of Congress thus to impose a corporate liability for individual wrongs is unquestioned it remains true that clear and unambiguous language must be used to show such an intention.⁵¹

SECTION 4. CORPORATE CAPACITY

Whether an Indian tribe, in the absence of some act of incorporation, is to be regarded as a corporate body is an interesting question. The answer to it must depend, in part, upon one's definition of the term "corporation." In the narrow sense in which the term is frequently used, a corporation is something chartered by a government, and in this sense only those Indian tribes which have been chartered by some government, e. g., the Pueblos of New Mexico incorporated by territorial legislation,⁵² and the tribes incorporated under section 17 of the Act of June 18, 1894,⁵³ are to be considered corporations.

The term "corporation," however, is frequently used in a broader sense,⁵⁴ as when it is stated, for instance, that the City of London, or the United States, is a body corporate, even though a charter of incorporation cannot be discovered. The term "corporation," in this sense, might be defined as designating a group of individuals to which the law ascribes legal personality, i. e., the complex of rights, privileges, powers, and immunities enjoyed by natural persons generally. This definition is not precise, because the rights, privileges, powers, and immunities of different classes of natural persons vary, and various organized groups may enjoy the status of individuals in some respects and not in others. The definition does, however, establish a direction and a method of analysis, and enables us to say that for certain purposes a group has corporate status.

In this sense, we may say that Indian tribes have been assigned corporate status for many different purposes.⁵⁵ Among these purposes are the right to sue, the capacity of being sued, the capacity to hold and exercise property rights not vested in any of the members of the tribe, the power to create contracts that bind the tribe even when in the course of time its entire membership has changed, and the separation of tribal liability from the liability of tribal members.

Various general statutes on Indian depredations, for instance, have authorized suits by injured citizens of the United States against Indian tribes whose members had committed such depredations.

ditions.⁸¹ None of these statutes imposes individual liability upon the members of the tribe; the liability imposed is purely tribal. It is, in the sense above defined, corporate, and has been so decided by the Court of Claims.⁸² The extent to which Indian tribes have been subjected to suit under these and similar statutes is elsewhere noted.⁸³

"The distinction between property rights of a tribe and rights of individual members is elsewhere analyzed in some detail,"⁸⁴ and for the present it is pertinent only to cite examples of this corporate attitude of the Indian tribes.

In the case of *Pennock v. McConut*⁸⁵ the Supreme Court, per Holmes, J., referred to "the corporate existence of the nation as such," in construing a treaty provision granting a tract to the Cherokee Nation "in fee simple for them and their descendants to have to them while they shall exist as a nation and live on it," and emphasized the distinction between the nation and its members, in reaching the conclusion that title to the tract rested with the former and that no trust was imposed in favor of the latter. The same distinction is confirmed in the case of Griffis v. Fisher,⁸⁶ holding that the particular members alive when the distribution of tribal property was ordered did not obtain any vested right which would preclude the liquidation of the tribe and Congress from later deeming that a new list of tribal members should participate in the property.⁸⁷

Another example of the distinction between tribal and individual property rights is found in claims cases which seek to distinguish between the claims of the tribe and the claims of individual members,⁸⁸ holding that damages to members, through denial of education promised in treaty, are not damages to a tribe, except in a sense too remote to serve as a basis of recovery.

Further examples of the distinction between corporate liability and individual liability are found in the cases of *Parks v. Rose*⁸⁹ and Turner v. United States,⁹⁰ the former case holding that an officer of a tribe was not personally responsible for the debts of the tribe; the latter case holding that the tribe itself was not liable at common law for torts committed by its members.⁹¹

The distinction between tribe and members is emphasized in United States v. Cherokee Nation,⁹² in holding that where Congress allows a tribe to bring suit not on its own behalf but on behalf of a designated class of individuals, some of them non-members, and excluding from the class certain members, the beneficial interest in a judgment rests in the class and not in the tribe.

The practical significance of the corporate concept lies in the form of analogical argument that proceeds from the fact that a tribe is treated as a corporation for some purposes to the conclusion that it may be so treated for other purposes.⁹³

Recognizing that the corporate existence and corporate powers of Indian tribes are at least subject to considerable uncertainties, Congress has enacted special or general legislation providing for the issuance of charters of incorporation upon application by the Indian tribes. The constitutional power of Congress to incorporate an Indian tribe is clear.⁹⁴ The only general legislation on this subject is found in section 17 of the Act of June 18, 1834,⁹⁵ which provides for the establishment of tribal corporate status in the following language:

"The Secretary of the Interior may, upon petition by at least one-third of the adult Indians, issue a charter of incorporation to such tribe. Provided, That such charter shall not become operative until ratified at a special election by a majority vote of the adult Indians living on the reservation. Such charter may confer to the incorporated tribe the power to purchase, take by gift, or bequest, or otherwise, own, hold, manage, operate, and dispose of property of every description, real and personal, including the power to purchase reduced Indian lands and to issue in exchange therefor interests in corporate property, and such further powers as may be incidental to the conduct of corporate business, not inconsistent with law, but no authority shall be granted to sell, mortgage, or lease for a period exceeding ten years any of the land included in the limits of the reservation. Any charter so issued shall not be revoked or surrendered except by Act of Congress.

Various special acts establish procedure for acquiring corporate status applicable to designated tribes or areas.

Section 1 of the Act of May 1, 1935,⁹⁶ extending the foregoing section to Alaska, contains the following proviso:

" . . . That groups of Indians in Alaska not heretofore recognized as bands or tribes, but having a common bond of occupation, or association, or residence within a well-defined neighborhood, community, or rural district, may organize to adopt constitutions and bylaws and to receive charters of incorporation and Federal loans under sections 10, 17, and 10 of the Act of June 18, 1834 (48 Stat. 934).

Section 3 of the Oklahoma Indian Welfare Act of June 20, 1906,⁹⁷ provides:

Any recognized tribe or band of Indians residing in Oklahoma shall have the right to organize for its common welfare and to adopt a constitution and bylaws, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe. The Secretary of the Interior may issue to any such organized group a charter of incorporation, which shall become operative when ratified by a majority vote of the adult members of the organization voting. Provided, however, That such charter shall be valid unless the total vote cast be at least 80 per centum of those entitled to vote. Such charter may convey to the incorporated group, in addition to any powers which may properly be vested in a body corporate under the laws of the State of Oklahoma, the right to participate in the revolving credit fund and to enjoy any other rights or privileges accorded to an organized Indian tribe under the Act of June 18, 1834 (48 Stat. 934). Provided, That the corporate funds of any such chartered group may be deposited in any national bank within the State of Oklahoma or otherwise invested, utilized, or disbursed in accordance with the terms of the corporate charter.

Where the corporate status of an Indian tribe is established, it will ordinarily be held to be within the scope of federal legislation extending certain benefits to corporations. Thus it has been administratively determined⁹⁸ that the Pueblos of

New Mexico are entitled to receive grazing privileges under the Taylor Grazing Act, under the clause in section 3 of that act¹¹⁴ conferring such rights upon corporations authorized to conduct business under the laws of the State. The principle involved would appear to be equally applicable to any Indian tribe which has a recognized corporate status, either under the Act of June 18, 1914, or otherwise.¹¹⁵

Where a tribe is incorporated under the Act of June 18, 1914,¹¹⁶ or similar legislation, the question may be raised, "How far does the incorporated tribe remain possessed of the rights and subject to the obligations vested in it prior to the issuance of its corporate charter?"

That an incorporated Indian tribe is not responsible for debts contracted by individual members, jointly or severally, prior to incorporation was the holding of the Massachusetts Supreme Judicial Court in Meyrick v. Guy Head,¹¹⁷ where the court declared, per Bigelow, J.

The claim which the plaintiff seeks to enforce is for a debt alleged to have been incurred by various persons belonging to the Guy Head tribe of Indians, now included within the district of Guy Head, for goods sold and delivered prior to the incorporation of said district by St. 1862, c. 181. The obvious and decisive objection to the enforcement of this claim is, that it is not due and owing to the "body politic and corporate" which that act creates. No contract, either express or implied, exists by force of which the corporate body can be held liable. There is no rule or principle of the common law by virtue of which the creation of a municipal corporation can be held to convert the debts previously due, either jointly or severally, from the persons who became members of the new municipality, into corporate liabilities. In the absence of any express legislative enactment, the corporation cannot be said to be the successors of or in privity with its members, so as to be responsible for their previously existing liabilities. There is no legal identity between a corporation and the individuals who compose it. The corporate body is a distinct legal entity, and can be held liable only in showing some breach of corporate duty or contract. (Ep. 134-135)

While the distinction here specified between obligations of members and corporate obligations would probably be followed today, it does not follow that an obligation of the tribe as such would be dissolved by incorporation. In fact, the incorporation provisions of the Act of June 18, 1914, have been consistently interpreted by the administrative authorities of the Federal Government and by the tribes themselves as modifying only the status of the tribe and not relieving it of any tribal obligations or depriving it of any tribal property. A customary provision of a tribal charter declares¹¹⁸

7. No property rights of the Northern Cheyenne Tribe, as heretofore constituted, shall in any way be impaired by anything contained in this charter, and the tribal ownership of unallotted lands, whether or not assigned to the use of any particular individual, is hereby expressly recognized. The individually owned property of members of the Tribe shall not be subject to any corporate debts or liabilities, without such owners' consent. Any existing lawful debts of the Tribe shall continue in force, except as such debts may be satisfied or cancelled pursuant to law.

SECTION 5. CONTRACTUAL CAPACITY

That an Indian tribe has legal capacity to enter into binding contracts is clearly established.¹¹⁹ Except where federal or tribal law otherwise provides, such contracts are subject to the same rules of contract law that are applied to contracts of non-Indians.

Thus it is held that contractual relations between a tribe and the United States may confer vested rights upon tribal members, which rights are not subject to invasion by Congress or the states.¹²⁰ Likewise, it has been held that a convention or treaty between the Colony of New Jersey and the Delaware Tribe is a contract, constitutionally protected against impairment by the legislature of the State of New Jersey.¹²¹

In accordance with the usual rule, a tribe is not bound by a contract which is not made by a proper representative or agent of the tribe,¹²² although a tribe, like any other party, may be estopped from denying the authority of its agent by accepting the benefit of services for which he has contracted.¹²³ Again following the usual rule of contract law, the Supreme Court has held that a tribal representative is not personally liable on a contract signed in the name of the principal, or reasonably to be construed as executed on behalf of such principal. This rule was laid down in Parks v. Ross,¹²⁴ a case arising out of the forced migration of Cherokee Indians, in 1838 and 1839, from Georgia to what is now Oklahoma. John Ross, the Principal Chief of the Cherokee Nation, was authorized to contract for the hire of wagons to transport the Cherokee Indians and as much of their belongings as they had managed to save from the whites who had overrun their lands. One of the wagon owners who entered into such a contract later brought suit against John Ross to recover extra compensation to which he deemed himself entitled. The Supreme Court held that there was no basis for a claim against Principal Chief Ross, since he had entered into the contract on behalf of the tribe. The Court declared, per Grier, J.

Now, it is an established rule of law, that an agent who contracts in the name of his principal is not liable to a suit on such contract, much less a public officer, acting for his government. As regards him the rule is, that he is not responsible on any contract he may make in that capacity, and wherever his contract or engagement is connected with a subject fairly within the scope of his authority, it shall be intended to have been made officially, and in his public character, unless the contrary appears by satisfactory evidence of an absolute and unqualified engagement to be personally liable.

The Cherokees are in many respects a foreign and independent nation. They are governed by their own laws and officers, chosen by themselves. And though in a state of priapage, and under the guardianship of the United States, this government has delegated no power to the courts of this District to arrest the public representatives or agents of Indian nations, who may be seized within their local jurisdiction, and compel them to pay the debts of their nation either to an individual of their own nation or a citizen of the United States. (P. 174.)

¹¹⁹ The argument noted in United States v. Boyd, 89 Fed. 647 (C. C. A. 4, 1897): "That as said Indians are the wards of the nation, all contracts made by them are void, unless they are approved by the proper officials of the government," is not supported by any statute or judicial holding. As to contracts involving tribal property, see Chapter 15, sec. 24.

The usual rules of contract law relating to the interpretation of contracts, the validity of releases, the statute of frauds, and various other matters have been affirmed in a considerable number of cases involving Indian tribes.¹² Congress, however, may, and frequently does, modify the usual rules of contract law with respect to particular tribal agreements. Thus for example, oral agreements may be given legal effect, by congressional legislation, in a case where such agreements would otherwise be deemed invalid. In the case of Indian Tribe of Indians v. United States,¹³ the Court of Claims noted that while ordinarily the terms of a transfer of land must be spelled out within the four corners of a written instrument, where Congress, at view of the disparity of intelligence and bargaining power involved in an agreement between an Indian tribe and the Federal Government, had expressly authorized the court to pass upon stipulations of agreements, whether written or oral.¹⁴ The Court was bound to give legal weight to oral assurances and explanations given to the Indians upon the execution of an agreement for land cession.

Where Congress has fixed the consideration for a tribal agreement releasing claims, the courts will not assume to reconsider the adequacy of the amount so fixed.¹⁵ The courts have likewise refused to review the propriety of congressional legislation which in effect nullifies an assignment of proceeds of a judgment made by an Indian tribe to an attorney.¹⁶

Certain special applications of general rules of contract law may be noted in the Indian cases. The usual rule that where disparity of bargaining power is found the contract will be interpreted in favor of the weaker party has particular application to agreements made between an Indian tribe and the United States.¹⁷ This rule, however, has no application to contracts or agreements made between two Indian tribes.¹⁸ The question of the effective date of an agreement between the United States and an Indian tribe arose in the case of Beau v. United States and Sioux Indians.¹⁹ It was held that such agreements become effective only upon ratification by Congress, and that such ratification does not relate back to the date of the agreement so as to legalize acts which amounted to trespass if the agreement for land cession) was not in effect.

There are few, if any, cases which give careful consideration to the question of what law is applicable to a contract made between an Indian tribe and third parties. In most cases the ordinary rules of the common law with respect to the execution and interpretation of contracts have been applied, by common consent of the parties. That (that law is applicable to a contract by which one tribe was incorporated into another was the holding in the case of Delaware Indians v. Cherokee Nation,²⁰ in which the court declared:

The common law did not prevail in the Cherokee country. . . . The agreement must be construed with reference to the constitution and laws of the Cherokee Nation. (P. 271.)

It is by no means clear, however, that this rule would apply to an agreement between a tribe and the United States.

The question of whether the State law of contract applies to a contract made by the United States on behalf of an Indian tribe with a third party was expressly left open in the case of Kyke v. United States,²¹ in which the Supreme Court said:

Whether the State statute law penalties and liquidated damages could affect a contract made by the United States on behalf of Indian wards need not be considered. (P. 427.)

General doctrines of conflict of laws would justify the application of the law of the forum where the tribal law that is applicable is not shown. As was said by Caldwell, J. in Dutton v. Gibson:²²

It is very well settled that it will not be presumed that the English common law is in force in any State not settled by English colonists. (Chilfney v. Railroad Co., 24 N. Y. 465; Strang v. O'Neil, 41 N. Y. 208; Philo v. Maholtz, 72 Mo. 522; Master's v. Law, 61 Cal. 622), and it has been expressly decided that it will not be presumed to be in force in the Creek nation (De Val v. Marshall, 36 Ark. 280), or in the Indian Territory. (Phelan v. Ponder, 24 C. & A. 305, 31 Fed. Rep. 532.)

If, therefore, the court had no means of ascertaining what the law or custom of the Creek nation was on this question it should have applied the law of the forum.

The interpretation of attorneys' contracts in connection with claims against the United States has been a source of considerable litigation.²³ No principles peculiar to Indian law appear to be involved in these cases.

The foregoing discussion of the validity and interpretation of contracts made by an Indian tribe assumes that the contract in question is not one forbidden by federal law. It must be recognized, however, that the Federal Government has severely restricted the contractual powers of an Indian tribe. Those restrictions which relate particularly to the disposition of real property will be considered in a subsequent chapter dealing with tribal property. A broader restriction upon the scope of tribal contracts was imposed in the Act of March 3, 1871,²⁴ as amended by the Act of May 31, 1872.²⁵ These provisions were embodied in the Revised Statutes as sections 2103 to 2106, and are now embodied in title 25 of the United States Code as sections 81 to 81. Section 81 contains this important provision:

No agreement shall be made by any person with any tribe of Indians, or individual Indians not citizens of the United States, for the payment or delivery of any money or other thing of value, in present or in prospective, or for the granting or procuring any privilege to him, or any other person in consideration of services, for said Indians relative to their lands, or to any claims growing out of, or in reference to, annuities, installments, or other moneys, claims, demands, or things, under laws or treaties with the United States, or official acts or any officers thereof, or in any way connected with or due from the United States, unless such contract or agreement be executed and approved as follows:

The section then sets forth detailed requirements as to form and manner of execution, the most important of which is the re-

The section further provides that, "all contracts or agreements made in violation of this section shall be null and void" and establishes a special procedure for suit to recover money improperly paid out by or on behalf of an Indian tribe under a prohibited contract.

Section 82 provides for departmental supervision of payments made "to any agent or attorney" under such contract or agreement. Section 83 provides for the prosecution of persons receiving money contrary to the provisions of sections 81 and 82, and provides that any district attorney who fails to prosecute such a case upon application shall be removed from office and that any person in the employ of the United States who shall assist in the making of such a contract shall be "dismissed from the service of the United States, and be forever disqualified from holding any office of profit or trust under the same."

Section 84 provides that no assignment of any contract entered by section 81 shall be valid unless approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs and the Secretary of the Interior.

A specific modification of the foregoing statutory provisions was made by the Act of June 26, 1938,¹² which applied only to contracts made and approved prior to that date and declared that as to such contracts the requirement of the original statute that the contract "have a fixed limited time to run, which shall be distinctly stated" and that the contract "shall fix 'the amount or rate per centum of the fee' should be considered satisfied by attorneys' contracts "in the prosecution of claims against the United States, which provide that such contracts or agreements shall run for a period of years therein specified, and as long thereafter as may be required to complete the business therein provided for, or words of like import, or which provide that compensation for services rendered shall be on a quantum-meruit basis not to exceed a specified percentage."

In the case of McLurray v. Choctaw Nation,¹³ the Court of Claims declared

Section 2108, Revised Statutes, is a most stringent and protective enactment. The section points out in precise terms the method of contracting with Indian tribes. . . . If this method is not followed, any proceeding contrary thereto is absolutely void. Any money paid upon contracts not executed according to its terms and approved by the Secretary of the Interior and Commissioner of Indian Affairs may be recovered back by the Indians. (p. 406)

The scope of the prohibitions imposed by the statutes in question was given careful consideration in two important Supreme Court cases. In the case of Green v. Menominee Tribe,¹⁴ it was held that this statute rendered invalid a contract between an Indian tribe and a licensed trader whereby the tribe undertook to compensate the trader for his services in making lumber equipment available to individual members of the tribe. The fact that a representative of the Interior Department participated in the making of the contract and was to participate in its performance was held not to remove the agreement from the prohibitions of the statute.

In Pueblo of Santa Rosa v. Full,¹⁵ the prohibitory statute was held applicable to an alleged contract by which an attorney sought to prosecute certain claims on behalf of an alleged Indian pueblo of Arizona.

While the foregoing cases leave some doubt as to the exact scope of the statute, it is at least clear that the statute applies only to contracts with Indians "relative to their lands, or to any claims" and does not apply to matters not comprised within these two categories.

Some light is thrown upon the intended scope of the statute by the extensive report of the House Committee on Indian Affairs on the lands which the statute was designed to circumvent, and the expected consequences of the legislation. In general the legislation was directed against the "golf-club lobby of those defenseless people" by attorneys and claim-agents.¹⁶

The statutory restrictions upon tribal contracts have been modified in sections 36 and 37 of the Act of June 18, 1934.¹⁷ By the former section each tribe adopting a constitution under this act became entitled to employ legal counsel, the choice of counsel and the fixing of fees to be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. The effect of this provision was thus stated in a memorandum of the Solicitor for the Interior Department:¹⁸

The Minnesota Chippewa Tribe has organized and adopted a constitution and bylaws pursuant to section 36 of the Indian Reorganization Act of June 18, 1934 (49 Stat. 1981). That section declares, among other things, that such an organized tribe shall have the power "to employ legal counsel, the choice of counsel and fees to be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior." Your proposed letter raises the question of whether the provision in section 36 just quoted impeded, as to contracts to which section 81, Title 25, U. S. C., otherwise would be applicable, the applicable requirements set forth in said section 81. Section 81 is confined to a certain class of contracts, that is, contracts for services relating to Indian lands, or to any claims growing out of or in reference to annuities, ransoms, or other monies, claims, demands, or things under the laws or treaties with the United States, or official acts of any official thereof, or in any way connected with or done from the United States. Counsel is not calling for the performance of legal services connected with any of the matters or things mentioned in section 81 obviously are controlled by section 36 of the Reorganization Act and may be entered into without regard to the requirements of section 81.

The Minnesota Chippewa contract provides for the performance of legal services in relation to claims of the tribes against the United States Government. This is the sort of contract to which section 81 applies and the requirements of that section should be observed unless they are superseded by section 36 of the Reorganization Act. To the extent of any conflict or inconsistency, it is clear that section 36 is controlling and supersedes the prior law. Requirements of the prior law not directly inconsistent or conflicting may also be superadded as to the particular kind of contract to which section 36 applies if such was the intent of Congress. A consideration of the general background and purpose of the Indian Reorganization Act leaves no doubt that the purpose of the statutory provision in question was to increase the scope of responsibility and discretion afforded the tribe in its dealings with attorneys. Earlier drafts of legislation contained provisions limiting the fees that might be charged. After considerable discussion before the Senate Committee (Hearings before the Committee on Indian Affairs, United States Senate, 73rd Congress, 2d session, S. 2716 and S. 8045, part 2, pages 244-247), it was decided that the Secretary of the Interior should have the actual power to approve or veto the choice of counsel. This discussion would have been futile and the statutory provision would have been meaningless if the intention had been to make those contracts subject to the provisions of section 81, Title 25 of the Code.

I am inclined to the view that provision as to contracts for the employment of legal counsel are concerned. Congress intended to empower the organized tribe to make such contracts, subject only to the limitations imposed by section 16 of the Reorganization Act. The matter is by no means free from difficulty, however, and it may be that the courts when called upon to consider the question, will hold that the two statutes should be treated as one and that the requirements of both in the absence of conflict or inconsistency must be observed. In this situation it is apparent that attorneys may desire for their own protection to have the contract executed in conformity with the requirements of both statutes. Such appears to be the position of the attorneys seeking employment by the Modoc and Chinook Tribe. Such a position is not unreasonable and I recommend that no objection be raised to approval of this or any other contract so executed.

Constitutions of Indian tribes adopted pursuant to the Act of June 18, 1934, generally contain some such provision as the following, in line with the statutory requirement on the point.¹⁴

ARTICLE V. POWERS OF THE COMMUNITY COUNCIL.

Section 1. Enumerated powers.—The council of the Fort Bidwap Community shall have the following powers, the exercise of which shall be subject to popular referendum as provided heretofore.

(b) To employ legal counsel for the protection and advancement of the rights of the community and its members, the charter of council and claims of fees to be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Apart from contracts involving a disposition of tribal property, the contracts made by chartered tribes are subject to the limitations imposed by the corporate charter. Typical of such limitations are the following, taken from the charter of the Corelo Indian Community of the Round Valley Indian Reservation, California.¹⁵

5. The Corelo Indian Community, subject to any restrictions contained in the Constitution and laws of the United States, or in the Constitution and By-laws of the Corelo Indian Community, shall have the following corporate powers:

(a) To borrow money from the Indian Credit Fund in accordance with the terms of section 10 of the Act of June 18, 1934 (48 Stat. 984), or from any other governmental agency, or from any member or association of members of the Corelo Indian Community, and to use such funds directly for productive Community enterprises, or to loan money thus borrowed to individual members or associations of members of the Community. Provided, That the amount of indebtedness to which the Corelo Indian Community may subject itself, aside from loans from the Indian Credit Fund, shall not exceed $10,000 except with the express approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

(c) To engage in any business that will further the economic well-being of the members of the Corelo Indian Community or to undertake any activity of any nature whatever, not inconsistent with law or with any provisions of this Charter.

(f) To make and perform contracts and agreements of every description, not inconsistent with law or with any provisions of this Charter, with any person, partnership, association, or corporation, with any municipality or any county, or with the United States or the State of California, including partnerships with the State of California for the rendition of public services. Provided, That any contract involving payment of money for the corporation in excess of $2,000 in any one fiscal year other than a contract for the use of the revolving loan fund established under section 10 of the Act of June 18, 1934 (18 Stat. 984), shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior or his duly authorized representative.

(g) To pledge or assign chattels or future Community income due or to be due to the Community under any notes, leases, or other contracts whether or not such notes, leases, or contracts are in existence at the time, or from any source. Provided, That such agreements of pledge or assignment except to the Federal Government shall not extend more than ten years from the date of execution and shall not cover more than one-half of the net Community income in any one year. And provided further, That any such agreement shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior or his duly authorized representative.

(h) To deposit corporate funds, from whatever source derived, in any national or State bank to the extent that such funds are required by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, or secured by a surety bond, or other security, approved by the Secretary of the Interior, or to deposit such funds in the Postal Savings Bank or with a bonded discharging officer of the United States to the credit of the Corelo Indian Community.

The superlative provisions of sections 5 (d), 5 (e), 5 (f), 5 (g), and 5 (h), above set forth, are subject to termination under section 6 of the corporate charter, which reads:

6. Upon the request of the Corelo Indian Community Council for the termination of any supervisory powers reserved to the Secretary of the Interior under Sections 5 (d), 5 (e), 5 (f), 5 (g), 5 (h), and section 8 of this Charter, the Secretary of the Interior, if he shall approve such request, shall thereupon submit the question of such termination to the Corelo Indian Community for a referendum vote. The termination shall be effective upon ratification by a majority vote at an election in which at least 80 per cent of the adult members of the Corelo Indian Community residing on the reservation shall vote. If at any time after ten years from the effective date of this Charter, such request shall be made and the Secretary shall disapprove such request or fail to approve or disapprove it within 90 days after its receipt, the question of the termination of any such supervisory power may then be submitted by the Secretary of the Interior or by the Community Council to popular referendum of the adult members of the Corelo Indian Community actually living within the reservation and if the termination is approved by two-thirds of the eligible voters, it shall be effective.

By section 17 of the act quoted, each tribe receiving a charter of incorporation might be empowered thereby to purchase, take by gift, or bequest, or otherwise, own, hold, manage, operate, and dispose of property of every description, real and personal, * * * and such further powers as may be incidental to the conduct of corporate business, not inconsistent with law, but no authority shall be granted to sell, mortgage, or lease for a period exceeding ten years any of the land included in the limits of the reservation.

This provision has been construed as granting to the incorporated Indian tribes very extensive powers to contract with respect to all matters of tribal concern, including tribal property. The extent to which this section legally agreements with respect to tribal property which were formerly prohibited is a matter which must be reserved for further discussion in connection with our analysis of tribal property rights.¹⁶

¹⁴ Constitution of the Fort Bidwap Indian Community, approved December 18, 1935.

SECTION 6. CAPACITY TO SUE

That Indian tribes may, under certain circumstances, sue and be sued is clear from the large number of such suits which are analyzed in this chapter and other chapters of this work. Since, however, nearly all such suits have been expressly authorized in general or special statutes, the question of whether an Indian tribe may sue or be sued in the absence of such express statutory authorization is more difficult to answer.

A STATUTES AUTHORIZING SUITS BY TRIBES

Statutes authorizing suits by Indian tribes include: (a) jurisdictional acts authorizing suits against the United States, and sometimes against other tribes, in the Court of Claims; (b) statutes authorizing suits against third parties to determine questions of ownership; and (c) statutes authorizing suits against third parties to determine the measure of compensation due from third parties for property taken.

(a) Within the scope of this chapter it is not possible to include more than a simple reference to statutes conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to hear tribal claims;¹²⁰ cases in which these claims are adjudicated;¹²¹ and statutes comprising ing claims.¹²²

The language of special jurisdictional acts varies so fundamentally from act to act that it is impossible to list any common principles applicable to all Indian claims cases and not applicable to other cases. There are certain maxims which frequently occur, in these cases, such as the maxim that acts authorizing suit on claims against the Government are to be narrowly construed;¹²³ that such acts will ordinarily be construed as granting a forum rather than determining liability; and that such acts will not be construed, in the absence of clear language to the contrary, as empowering a court to consider the justice or injustice of a law, treaty, or agreement.¹²⁴ It may be doubted, however, whether these maxims show more than verbal uniformities, and they are certainly of little help in predicting the outcome of cases. Indian claims cases, like other Indian cases, involve questions with respect to tribal property rights, tribal powers, the powers of the Federal Government, and similar questions of substantive law, elsewhere considered,¹²⁵ and which have a greater bearing upon the actual decisions in claims cases than any rules which might be derived from considerations limited purely to these cases.

(b) Various statutes provide for suits by Indian tribes against third parties to determine land ownership. Perhaps the most important of these statutes is the Pueblo Lands Act,¹²⁶ which is discussed elsewhere.¹²⁷

(c) Tribal capacity to sue is implied in the various right-of-way statutes which permit appeals from administrative decisions on the amount of damages due for tribal property taken or damaged.¹²⁸

(d) As we have already noted, capacity to sue is not conferred by Article III, section 2, of the Federal Constitution, providing for federal jurisdiction over controversies "between a State . . . and foreign States." The learned opinion of Chief Justice Marshall established the proposition, which has not since been questioned by any federal court, that an Indian tribe is not a foreign state within the meaning of this provision.¹²⁹

B STATUTES AUTHORIZING SUITS AGAINST TRIBES

Just as there are various statutes allowing suits by Indian tribes, so there are a number of statutes which authorize suits against Indian tribes.

We have already noted and need not here reconsider, the various depredation statutes which authorized suits against Indian tribes and allowed, in effect, the execution of judgment upon the tribal funds of the tribe in the United States Treasury, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.¹³⁰

Congress has from time to time authorized various other suits against Indian tribes by private citizens. Thus, for example, the Act of May 29, 1908,¹³¹ confers jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to adjudicate a suit by designated traders against the Menominee tribe and members thereof, and requires that the Secretary of the Interior shall thereupon, in case judgments be against the said Menominee tribe of Indians as a tribe, direct the payment of said judgments out of any funds in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of said tribe and who, in case judgments be against individual members of said Menominee tribe of Indians, shall, through the disbursing officers in charge of said Green Bay Agency, pay to or any annuity due or which may become due said Indian as an individual or as the head of a family from the United States or from the share of said Indian as an individual or as the head of a family in any distribution of tribal funds deposited in the Treasury of the United States, the amounts of such judgments to the claimants in whose favor such judgments have been rendered.

C JURISTIC CAPACITY IN THE ABSENCE OF SPECIFIC STATUTES

There remains the question of whether suit may be brought by or against an Indian tribe where Congress is silent.

The latter portion of this question is easier to answer than the former. We have noted that an Indian tribe is a municipality.¹³² As such it would appear to be exempt from suit unless it has consented thereto or been subjected thereto by a superior power.

The general attitude of Congress and the courts towards suits against Indian tribes is clarified in an opinion of Caldwell, J., in Thibo v Choctaw Tribe of Indians,¹³³ where it was held that a suit against an Indian tribe could not be maintained in the absence of clear congressional authorization.

The court declared:

It may be conceded that it would be competent for congress to authorize suit to be brought against the Choctaw Nation upon any and all the causes of action in any court it might designate. Acts of congress have been passed, specially conferring on the courts jurisdiction over all controversies arising between the railroad companies authorized to construct their roads through the Indian Territory and the Choctaw Nation and the other nations and tribes of Indians owning lands in the territory through which the railroads might be constructed. Other acts have been passed authorizing suits to be brought by or against these Indian Nations in the Indian Territory to settle controversies between them and the United States and between themselves. Among such acts are the following: "An act for the ascertainment of amount due the Choctaw Nation" 21 Stat 704 Act of July 1, 1884 (23 Stat 70), granting the right of way through the Indian Territory to the Southern Kansas Railway Company, 21 Stat 73. Smith, Paris & Dardanelle Railway Company through Indian Territory, 12 Stat 745. An act to authorize the Kansas & Arkansas Valley Railway Company to construct an additional railroad through the Indian Territory, 20 Stat 793.

The constitutional competency of congress to pass such acts has not yet been questioned, but no court has ever presumed to take jurisdiction of a cause against any of the five civilized Nations in the Indian Territory in the absence of an act of congress expressly conferring the jurisdiction in the particular case. (Pp 375-374.)

* * * Being a domestic and dependent state, the United States may authorize suit to be brought against it. But, for obvious reasons, this power has been sparingly exercised. It has been the settled policy of the United States not to authorize suits except in a few cases, where the subject-matter of the controversy was particularly specified, and was of such a nature that the public interests, as well as the interests of the Nation, seemed to require the exercise of the jurisdiction. It has been the policy of the United States to place and maintain the Choctaw Nation and the other civilized Indian Nations in the Indian Territory, so far as relates to suits against them, on the plane of independent states. A state, without its consent, cannot be sued by an individual. "It is a well-established principle of jurisprudence in all civilized nations that the sovereign cannot be sued in its own courts or by any other without its consent and permission, but that if, in any, if it thinks proper, waive this privilege, and permit itself to be sued by a defendant in a suit by individuals or by another state." Beers v. Arkansas, 20 How 527. The United States has waived its privilege in this regard, and allowed suits to be brought against it in a few specified cases. Some of the states of the Union have at times claimed no immunity from suits, but experience soon demonstrated this to be an unwise and extremely injurious policy, and most, if not all, of the states after a brief experience, abandoned it, and refused to submit themselves to the coercive process of judicial tribunals. When the Supreme Court of the United States in Chisholm v. Georgia, 2 Dall. 419, decided that under the constitution that court had original jurisdiction of a suit by a citizen of one state against another state, the eleventh amendment to the constitution was straightway adopted, taking away this jurisdiction. Since the adoption of this amendment, the contract of a state "is substantially without sanction, except that which arises out of the loans and good faith of the state itself, and these are not subject to coercion." In re Ayres, 123 U S 413, 505, 8 Sup Ct 161. One claiming to be creditor of a state is remitted to the justice of its legislature. It has been the settled policy of congress, not to sanction suits generally against these Indian Nations, or subject them to suits upon contracts or other causes of action at the instance of private parties. In respect to their liability to be sued by individuals, except in the few cases we have mentioned, they have been placed by the United States, substantially, on the plane occupied by the states under the eleventh amendment to the constitution. The civilized Nations in the Indian Territory are probably better guarded against oppression from this source than the states themselves, for the states may consent to be sued, but the United States has never given its permission that these Indian Nations might be sued generally, even with their consent. As such as the Choctaw Nation is said to be in lands and waters, it would soon be impoverished if it was subject to the jurisdiction of the courts, and required in respect to all the demands which private parties chose to prefer against it. The intention of congress to confer such a jurisdiction upon any court would have to be expressed in plain and unambiguous terms. (Pp 375-370.)

There is at least language supporting the rule that a tribe cannot be sued without its consent, in the Supreme Court opinion in Tuam v. United States.²⁴⁸ And in the case of *United States v. P. R. Vidity & Guar Co.*²⁴⁹ the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Tenth Circuit declared, citing the two cases above noted:

* * * the Indian tribes, like the United States, are sovereigns immune from civil suit except when expressly authorized. (P. 810.)

In line with the policy set forth in the Thabo case, it has been held that where the tribe itself is not subject to suit, tribal officers cannot be sued on the basis of tribal obligations.²⁵⁰

Although a tribe, as a municipality, is not subject to suit without its consent, it may be argued that a tribe has legal capacity to consent to such a suit. The power to consent to such suit must be regarded as cognate with the power to bring suit.

Some support for the view that an Indian tribe is capable of appearing in litigation as a plaintiff or voluntary defendant is found in the statement of the Supreme Court in United States v. Candelaria.²⁵¹

It was settled in Lane v. Pueblo of Santa Rosa, 240 U S 110, that under territorial laws enacted with congressional sanction each pueblo in New Mexico—meaning the Indians comprising the community—became a private person and entitled to sue and defend in respect of its lands. (Pp 442-443.)

This statement, standing by itself, could be given a limited scope on the ground that the Pueblos are statutory corporations. The fact remains, however, that the Supreme Court has authorized suits in which Indian tribes were parties litigant, without any question of legal capacity being raised. An outstanding case in point is the case of Cherokee Nation v. Hitchcock.²⁵² This was a suit brought by an Indian tribe against the Secretary of the Interior. Although judgment was rendered for the defendant, no question was raised, apparently, as to the capacity of the principal plaintiff (individual members were joined as parties plaintiff) to bring the suit.

given them as subjects of rights and duties, and the extent to which such rights and duties have been recognized in Indian treaties,²⁰⁷ suggests that the courts may hold that even a tribe not expressly challenged as a corporation may bring and defend suits.²⁰⁸ There are, however, some dicta contra,²⁰⁹ and in the absence of any clear holding, judgment must be reserved.

²⁰⁸ The right to sue the United States of course presents an independent question.

²¹⁰ In Juara v. United States and Yuma Indians, 27 C. Cl. 278 (1892) for instance, the Court of Claims, holding that the Indian Department Act of March 3, 1891, 26 Stat. 581, in allowing suits to be brought against tribes, and execution to be made against tribal funds, did not require notice to the tribal defendants, disallowed (a) that and (b) that the statute expressly required the service of notice upon the Attorney General, who was competent to protect the interests of the Indian tribe.

The first of these arguments is clearly unavailing as regards individual Indians, see Chapter 8, supra, and its soundness as applied to a tribal plaintiff at a tribe defending a suit to which it has consented may be seriously questioned.

SECTION 7. TRIBAL HUNTING AND FISHING RIGHTS

Rights of hunting and fishing guaranteed to Indian tribes by treaty²¹² or statute²¹³ are in some respects treated as property rights, and are so dealt with in the following chapter.²¹⁴

These rights, however, differ in several respects from ordinary property rights, and therefore deserve brief mention in a discussion of the general legal status of Indian tribes.

Indian hunting and fishing rights are, in general, of two sorts, those pertaining to Indian reservation lands and those pertaining to nonreservation (generally ceded) lands.

The extent of Indian rights with respect to reservation lands is noted in an opinion of the Acting Solicitor²¹⁵ for the Interior Department, upholding the exclusive right of the Red Lake Chippewa Tribe to fish in the waters of Red Lake, and declaring

An examination of the various treaties between the United States and the Chippewa Indians discloses that while the right in the Indians to hunt and fish on ceded lands was reserved in some of the earlier treaties (see Article 5, Treaty of July 20, 1837, 7 Stat. 530, Article 2, Treaty of October 4, 1812, 7 Stat. 501, and Article 11, Treaty of September 30, 1809, 10 Stat. 1109), no reservation of the right to hunt and fish was made with respect to the unceded lands of the Red Lake Reservation. But such a reservation was not necessary to preserve the right on the lands reserved or retained in Indian ownership. The right to hunt and fish was part of the larger rights possessed by the Indians in the lands reserved and ceded to them. Such right, which was "not much less necessary to the existence of the Indians than the atmosphere they breathe" remained in them unless granted away. United States v. Winans, 198 U.S. 871. Speaking of a between the United States and the United Kingdom, 87 Stat. 1838, and the Treaty of July 7, 1911, between the United States and Great Britain, Japan, and Russia, 87 Stat. 1612, restricting pelagic sealing in certain waters, specifically exempt from such restrictions the natives dwelling on the coasts of those waters.

* * * for the relinquishment of certain rights guaranteed to them by the first article of the treaty made with them April eighteenth, eighteen hundred and fifty-nine, by which they are permitted to hunt, gather roots and berries, and pasture stock, in common with citizens of the United States, upon the lands and waters of the United States outside their reservations.

and appropriated the sum of five thousand dollars to defray the expense of the treaty and pay the Indians for their relinquishment of such rights.

²¹⁶ See Chapter 15, especially sec. 21.

similar situation, the Supreme Court of Wisconsin in State v. Jackson, 249 N. W. 285, 288, said:

"While the treaty entered into did not specifically reserve to the Indians such hunting and fishing rights as they had therefore enjoyed we think it reasonably appears that there is no necessity for specifically mentioning such hunting and fishing rights with respect to the lands reserved to them. At the time the treaty of 1761 was entered into there was not a 'shadow of impediment upon the hunting rights of the Indians' on the lands retained by them. The treaty was not a grant of rights to the Indians, but a grant of rights from them—a reservation of those not granted." United States v. Winans, 198 U. S. 371, 25 S. Ct. 662, 664, 49 L. Ed. 1689. We entertain no doubt that the rights of the Indians to hunt and fish upon their own lands continued."

The court further recognized that as to patented lands inside the reservation, the fish and game laws of the State of Wisconsin were without force and effect.

By tradition and habit the Indians as a race are hunters and fishermen, depending largely upon these pursuits for their livelihood. Their mineral and immaterial right to follow these pursuits on the lands and in the waters of their reservations is universally recognized. The Indians of the Red Lake Reservation appear to have asserted and exercised an exclusive right of fishing in the waters of Upper and Lower Red Lakes from the beginning, subject only to Federal control and regulation. The right of the Indians to hunt and fish in the waters of the reservation of the State of Minnesota but has been recognized and acquiesced in.

Citizen-suites somewhat similar to these, coupled with the rule of liberal construction uniformly applied in determining the rights of Indians, were cited by the Supreme Court of the United States in support of its conclusion that the Metlakatla Indians had an exclusive right to fish in the waters adjacent to Annette Islands in Alaska notwithstanding the fact that the Act of Congress setting aside the islands as a reservation for the Indians made no mention of the surrounding waters or the fishing rights of the Indians therein. Alaska Pacific Fisheries v. United States, 248 U. S. 80.

In United States v. Sturgeon (27 Federal Cases, Case No. 101181), the court gave consideration to the rights of the Indians of the Pyramid Lake Indian Reservation in Nevada to fish in the waters of a lake inside the boundaries of their reservation and held:

"The president has set apart the reservation for the use of the Pah Utes and other Indians residing therein. He has done this by authority of law. We know that the lake was included in the reservation, but it might be a fishing ground for the Indians. The law of the reservation have been drawn around it for the purpose of excluding white people from fishing there except by proper authority. It is plain that nothing of value to the Indians will be left of their reservation if all the whites who choose may resort there to fish. In our judgment, those who thus encroach on the reservation and fishing ground violate the order setting it apart for the use of the Indians, and consequently do so contrary to law."

In an opinion dated May 14, 1928 (24 MS358), the Solicitor for this Department ruled that the State of Washington was without right to regulate or control the use of boats on navigable bodies of water within the Quinalt Reservation in that State. The Solicitor said, and his remarks apply with equal force here:

"Manifestly, unless the Indians of the Quinalt Reservation are protected in the exclusive use and occupancy of their reservation including the waters therein, navigable or nonnavigable, then their rights may become subject to serious interference, if not jeopardy, by outsiders. If we admit the right of the State to invade the reservation for the purpose of regulating or controlling the use of boats on the Quinalt or any other body of navigable water therein it would be tantamount to recognizing the right of the State to regulate other activities there, including fishing. This we cannot afford to do."

Muncie was admitted into the Union in 1833. The Indian title was subsequently recognized by treaty and Act of Congress, then extended to all of the lands surrounding Upper and Lower Red Lakes. The Indian title was that of occupancy only, the ultimate fee being in the United States, but the right of occupancy extended to and included the right to fish in the waters of the Lakes. United States v. Winans, supra. These rights insofar as the diminished reservation is concerned have been surrendered or relinquished by the Indians not have been taken away by any Act of Congress of which I am aware. In these circumstances, it is not unreasonable to hold that the State upon its admission into the Union took title to the submerged lands subject to the occupancy rights of the Indians in virtue of which the Indians possess an exclusive right of fishing in the waters of the Lakes. Beecher v. Wehrby, supra, United States v. Thomas, supra. It thus be the correct view, and I think it is, the exercise by the Indians of the right of fishing is subject to Federal and not State regulation and control. United States v. Kagawa, 318 U. S. 875, 16 S. Ct. 1462, 110 Fed. 130, Peters v. Martin, 111 Fed. 244, 10 S. Ct. 1040, 129 Fed. 246, United States v. Hamilton, 278 Fed. 185, 12 S. Ct. 1040, 63 Minn. 354, 51 N. W. 533.

In expressing the foregoing view, I am mindful of the statement of the Supreme Court in United States v. Holt Bank, supra, that while the Indians of the Red Lake Reservation were to have access to the navigable waters therein and were to be entitled to be taken in navigation, "these were common rights, common to all, whether Indian or white." But when this statement is read, as it should be, in the light of the decisions cited in its support, it becomes apparent that the court had in mind rights of navigation of a public nature and not private rights of ownership such as the Indian right of fishing. The latter right was not involved and was neither considered nor discussed.

Accordingly, since the Indians' exclusive rights to fish in the waters of Lower Red Lake and that part of Upper Red Lake inside the Indian reservation is supported by all of the decided cases touching on the subject, it is my opinion that continued administrative recognition of such rights as exclusive in the Indians is fully justified.

Such rights of hunting and fishing as the Indian tribes may enjoy are subject, in the first instance, to Federal regulation. Thus it has been held that Congress may restrict tribal rights by conferring on a state powers inconsistent with such rights, through an enabling act.²²

Likewise, the United States may limit Indian hunting and fishing rights by international treaty.²³ The extent and constitutional limits of such regulatory powers of State and Federal Governments are questions more fully considered in other chapters of this volume.²⁴ Within the limits suggested tribal rights of hunting and fishing have received judicial recognition and protection against state and private interference,²⁵ and even against interference by Federal administrative officials.²⁶

SECTION 1. DEFINITION OF TRIBAL PROPERTY

Tribal property may be formally defined as property in which an Indian tribe has a legally enforceable interest. The exact nature of this interest it will be the purpose of this chapter to delineate. It will, however, clarify the scope and purpose of the chapter to note certain implications of the formal definition of tribal property here presented.

If tribal property is property in which a tribe has a legally enforceable interest, it must be distinguished, on the one hand, from property of individual Indians, and, on the other hand, from public property of the United States. Actually, we find that tribal property partakes of some of the incidents of both individual private property and public property of the United States. The distinctions on both sides, however, are as significant as the similarities. It may be noted that historically, conceptions of tribal property have oscillated between the two limits of individual private property and public property. When, for instance, Pueblo property was treated like any other private corporate property in the Territory of New Mexico,¹ no special problems of Indian law were presented. Likewise, where lands, although set aside for Indian purposes, have not been the subject of any legally enforceable Indian rights, as in the case perhaps with public lands set aside for the establishment of an Indian hospital or school not restricted to any particular tribe, the lands remain public property of the United States and no question of tribal property is presented.²

² See Chapter 1, sec. 8, in 78. Even in the Indian school situation, tribal property rights may be created. In Alaska, for instance, reservations for native education have come to be treated, for most purposes, as Indian reservations. See Chapter 21, sec. 7. Similarly, we may note that the Joint Resolution of January 30, 1907, 29 Stat. 608, authorizing the use of the Fort Bidwell abandoned military reservation, "for the purpose of an Indian training school," has been construed as establishing an Indian reservation. The Act of January 27, 1913, 37 Stat. 602, refers to "Indians having rights on said reservation."

The distinction between the fact of use and enjoyment and the right of possession is essential in the understanding of Indian tribal property. The area of land reserved in the Washington Zoo for the exclusive use and occupancy of a herd of bunnies does not, by the fact of such reservation, cease to be the public property of the United States. The bunnies have no legally enforceable interest, no possessory right, in the land. It is true that they are allowed to occupy an area from which other animals and, except for certain Government employees, human beings, may be lawfully excluded. The bunnies, however, cannot bring an action of ejection and no other party can bring such an action on behalf of the bunnies.

From time to time, disinterested advocates have upheld what may be called the "narrative theory" of tribal property under which the rights, whatever they are, vested in the Indian tribe. In every case, however, in which this theory has been presented to the Supreme Court of the United States, it has been rejected.¹

A TRIBAL OWNERSHIP AND TENANCY IN COMMON

The distinction between tribal property and property owned in common by a group of Indians appears most clearly in connection with the claims repeatedly put forward by descendants of tribal members who are not themselves tribal members and who, under a theory of tenancy in common, would be entitled to share in the common property. But, if the property is indeed tribal, have no valid claim thereon. The Supreme Court has made it clear in such cases, Pleming v. McCurtain,² and Chippewa Indians of Minnesota v. United States,³ that where the Federal Government has dealt with Indians as a tribe no tenancy in common is created, and no descendible or alienable right accrues to the individual members of the tribe in being at the time the property vests. The fact that the plural form is used in describing the grantee does not show an intent to create a tenancy in common,⁴ nor does a limitation (to the tribe and their descendants) establish any basis for declaring a trust for descendants of individual members.⁵

A second distinction between tribal ownership and tenancy in common relates to the method of transfer. As the Attorney General declared, in the early case of the Christian Indians,⁶

The gravest of your questions remains to be answered. Can these Christian Indians sell the lands thus acquired? The right of alienation is incident to an absolute title. If the patent is not to a nation, tribe, or band, called by the name of the Christian Indians, but to the individual persons included within that designation, then all those persons are patentees, and all hold as tenants in common. No conveyance can be made into by the lawful deed of all. If any one refuses or is unable to consent, he cannot be deprived of his interest by an act of the others. Some of these persons being children, and some, perhaps, being under other legal disabilities, it will be impossible for any purchaser to get a good title if they are tenants in common.

But I think the patent will vest the title in the tribe. You have mentioned no fact to make me believe that there is action on tribal land-act was ever lost or merged into that of the Delaware. They are treated as a separate people, wholly distinct and different from the Delaware. The land, therefore, belongs to the nation or band, and can be disposed of only by treaty. (17-40-27)

A third distinction lies in the fact that debts of individuals may be set off against claims of tenants in common but not against claims of tribes. Thus in the case of Shoshone Tribe of Indians v. United States,⁷ the Government sought to offset, against allowed tribal claims, debts due from individual allottees to the United States for migration construction costs. This contention was rejected on the ground that debts of individual allottees were not debts of the Indian tribe.

The essential differences between tribal ownership and tenancy in common are thus analyzed by the Court of Claims in the case of Southern v. Cheyenne Nation and the United States,⁸ in an opinion quoted and affirmed by the Supreme Court.

The distinctive characteristics of communal property is that every member of the community is an owner of it as such. He does not take as heir, or purchaser, or grantee, if he does his right of property does not descend, if he renounces from the community if he expires, if he wishes to dispose of it he has nothing which he can convey, and yet he has a right of property in the land as perfect as that of any other person, and his children after him will enjoy all that he enjoyed, not as heirs but as communal owners. (P. 302.)

Perhaps all of these differences can be summed up in the conception of tribal property as corporate property.⁹

B TRIBAL OWNERSHIP AND INDIVIDUAL OCCUPANCY

Congress has consistently distinguished between the tribal interest in land and the complementary interest of the individual Indian in improvements thereon.¹⁰ Thus, a long series of congressional acts granting right-of-way across Indian reservations to various railroad companies contain the specification that damages shall be payable not only to the tribe but to individuals, wherever lands are "held by individual occupants according to the laws, customs, and usages" of the tribe in question.¹¹ Other right-of-way statutes provide in slightly different

Today a basic issue of policy in the administration of tribal property is whether the tribe that "owns" land will be allowed to exercise the powers of a landlord, i.e., to secure rentals and fees, to regulate land use and to withdraw land and privileges from those who flout the tribal regulations, or whether the Federal Government will administer "tribal" lands for the benefit of the Indians as it administers National Monuments, for instance, for the benefit of posterity, with the Indians having perhaps, as much actual voice in the former case as poverty has in the latter. ⁷ P. terms for damages to individual occupants caused by the granting of such rights-of-way.¹¹ Under such statutes, it has been said,

Where one has a base fee, it has been held that he should receive the full value of the land, as the interest of the grantor is too remote to be treated as property.

The fee of the territory of the Cherokee Nation is in the Nation, but the occupants of the land have so complete a right of enjoyment that, when a right of way is condemned, they are entitled to the compensation.¹²

Where Congress has provided for the sale of tribal lands, special provision has frequently been made for the payment of damages to individual occupants.¹³

While the Indian occupant of tribal land has such an interest as will entitle him to compensation when a right-of-way is granted across the land he occupies, it has been held administratively that such payments made to individual Indian occupants cannot satisfy the tribal right to compensation.¹⁴

C TRIBAL LANDS AND PUBLIC LANDS OF THE UNITED STATES

Although Indian tribal lands have been distinguished from public lands in various ways, there are certain situations in which tribal lands have been treated as public lands. For example it has been held that tribal lands, even though held by the tribe in fee, may be considered public lands of the United States for the purpose of erecting federal buildings thereon, at least where Congress has directed such action, or where the tribe itself has consented to the action.¹⁵

Again, it has been held that Indian lands are "public lands" within the meaning of a statute granting a right-of-way to a railroad company across "public lands," where the United States specifically undertakes to extinguish Indian title on the lands affected and where the statute is interpreted to cover Indian lands by the Executive Department charged with the administration of the act.¹⁶

Likewise, it has been held that land acquired by the United States in trust for an Indian tribe is immune from state zoning regulations which, in terms, do not apply to lands "belonging to and occupied by the United States."¹⁷

As already noted, the fact that Indian lands may be classified as "public lands" for certain purposes, does not negate their character as tribal property. Thus, surplus Indian lands although denominated "public lands of the United States" for purposes of disposition, are subject to restoration as tribal lands under section 3 of the Act of June 1, 1934.¹⁸

And where "public lands" are granted to a state or railroad, Indian lands will not be deemed to be covered in the grant in the absence of clear evidence of a congressional intent to include such lands.¹⁹

Similarly, it has been held that Indian tribal lands are not covered by statutes opening "public lands" to settlement,²⁰ nor are they comprised within the mineral laws affecting the public domain.²¹

D THE COMPOSITION OF THE TRIBE AS PROPRIETOR

To mark out the tribe in which any form of tribal property is vested is ordinarily a simple enough matter. There are, however, a number of cases in which, because of tribal amalgamation, dissolution, modification of membership rules, or uncertainties, and ambiguities in treaty or statutory designations, serious questions arise as to the composition of the tribe in which particular rights of property are vested. Insofar as these questions involve the issue of the tribal status, they have already received our consideration in Chapter 14. For present purposes it is enough to designate briefly the chief complications that have arisen in designating the tribe in which given property rights are vested.

One of these complications arises out of the practice in numerous early statutes and treaties, of dividing a tribal estate between those Indians desiring to maintain tribal relationships and communal property and those desiring to separate themselves from the tribe and hold their shares of tribal property in individual ownership. Typical of this arrangement is the Act of February 9, 1871.²² Under this statute the tribal estate was divided be-

"* * * The same acts which make the appropriations for new buildings make large appropriations for the support of the school on the reservation, and as the funds provided for the support of the school are a gift from the United States, no more show of intention that it was the intention of Congress that the provisions for new buildings should be construed as a gift, and that the money should be expended on the land known to belong to the Indians in fee" (P. 980).

A subsequent decision dated February 28, 1918, 94 Comp. Dec. 477, subscribes to the same doctrine. There the Comptroller ruled that public moneys could not be expended in erecting school buildings on Indian reservation lands the title to which was in the State. But he said:

"If the legal title to the land upon which it is contemplated to erect the building is in the State, the Government is not to be understood to use Government appropriations for the construction of the required buildings" * * * (P. 479).

between a "citizen party" and an "Indian party," the former to receive per capita shares of the tribal funds, and the latter to enjoy exclusive rights in the remaining tribal fund. Members of the "citizen party" were deemed to have made "full surrender and relinquishment" of all claims "to be thereafter known and considered as members of said tribe, or in any manner interested in any provision hereafter or hereafter to be made by any treaty or law of the United States for the benefit of said tribes." (See, § 1.)

A similar procedure was employed in certain cases where tribes were induced to migrate westward and those individuals remaining behind covered Indian covenants and thus lost any rights in the tribal property of the migrant tribe.¹

The problem of proportionate common ownership by two tribes is raised by the Act of March 2, 1890.²

A related problem is raised by the existence of separate treaty rights enjoyed by the Gros Ventre and the Assiniboin tribes of the Fort Belknap Reservation, which tribes, as a result of not occupying a single reservation,³ holding land in common, and acting through a single tribal council, have come to be amalgamated as a single tribe.⁴

The position of lands held by different Chippewa bands under the Act of January 14, 1884,⁵ has raised a number of complex questions which can hardly be noted within the confines of this discussion.⁶ While it is impossible to lay down a simple rule to determine when title to reservation lands is located in a tribe and when it is located in a component band, the opinion of the Supreme Court in *Chippewa Indians v. United States*⁷ indicates the factors that will be considered in such a determination. Among such factors particular importance attaches to the attitudes of other bands towards the claim of the band in question, the nature of the treaties made, whether with individual lands or with the entire tribe or nation, and the administrative practice of the Interior Department with respect to the use of lands and the disposition of proceeds therefrom.

The clarification of ambiguities in the designation of the Indian group for which a reservation has been set aside is exemplified in the case of the Colorado River Reservation. This reservation was originally set aside "for the Indians of the said river and its tributaries."⁸ It was held by the Secretary of the Interior Department that the Indians located on the reservation over a long period of years and recognized as a single tribe came to enjoy rights in the reservation which administrative officers could not thereafter diminish by location, on the reservation, Indians of other tribes residing within the Colorado River watershed.⁹

SECTION 2. FORMS OF TRIBAL PROPERTY

In the whole range of ownership forms known to our legal system, from simple ownership of money or chattels and fee simple title in real estate, through the many varieties of restricted and conditioned titles, trust titles and future interests, to the shadowy rights of perennities and contingent remainders, there is probably no form of property right that has not been lodged in an Indian tribe. The term tribal property, therefore, does not designate a single and definite legal institution, but rather a broad range within which important variations exist. These variations occur in every aspect of property law: in the duration of the possessory right, whether perpetual or limited, in the extent of that right, with respect, e. g., to timber, minerals, water, and improvements on tribal land, in the measure of supervision which the Federal Government reserves over the tribal property, and in the types of use and disposition which may be made of the property by the tribal "ownes." In view of these diversities, generalizations about "tribal property" should be scrutinized as critically as assertions about "property" in general.

A brief and incomplete list of the various tenures by which tribal property is held may serve to indicate the need for caution in dealing with generalizations about "Indian title" and "tribal ownership." SECTION 3. SOURCES OF TRIBAL RIGHTS IN REAL PROPERTY

The definition of tribal property rights in every decided case and in every actual situation involves some document or course of action which defines those rights. An analysis of the different ways in which tribal rights over property come into being is therefore prerequisite to a proper definition of those rights.

Interests in real property have been acquired by Indian tribes in at least six ways:

- 1 By aboriginal possession
- 2 By treaty
- 3 By act of Congress
- 4 By Executive action
- 5 By purchase
- 6 By action of a colony, state, or foreign nation

In sections 4 to 9 of this chapter, these six sources of tribal right will be dealt with.

A word of caution, however, must be offered against the assumption that the foregoing six methods are clearly distinguished from each other. In fact, there is an interconnection of all methods. Aboriginal possession may be confirmed by treaty or statute, a treaty may carry out objectives laid down in a statute, and vice versa, either may be implemented by Executive order or purchase. Action of the United States alone on any of these lines may parallel or confirm acts of prior sovereignty. But with all these qualifications, the six-fold division above proposed does offer a convenient method of arranging in workable compass the material pertaining to the creation of tribal property rights in land.

By way of corrective to any illusion of certainty that this division of material may stimulate, it is well to quote the words of the Supreme Court in Minnesota v. Littlechild:

"Now, in order to create a reservation it is not necessary that there should be a formal cession or a formal act setting apart a particular tract. It is enough that from what has been done there should be a certain defined tract appropriated to certain purposes."

* 185 U. S. 378, 380-380 (1902)

SECTION 4. ABORIGINAL POSSESSION

The derivation of Indian property rights from aboriginal possession "is not only the first source of tribal property rights in a historical sense, but is of first importance in that this source of property has greatly influenced tribal tenures established in other ways. Except in the light of this influence, it is difficult to understand why peculiar incidents should attach to property which has been purchased outright by an Indian tribe from a private person, or has been patented to the tribe by the United States in the same way that other public lands are patented to private individuals. That there are peculiar incidents attached even to fee-simple tenure by an Indian tribe is an undoubted fact, and the explanation of this fact is probably to be found in the conclusion that has emanated from the concept of aboriginal possession.

The problem of recognizing or denying possessory rights claimed by the aborigines in the soil of America engaged the attention of jurists and publicists from the discovery of America. A clear expression of the classical view, which influenced Chief Justice Marshall and other founders of American legal doctrine in this field, was given by Vattel.¹ The conflicting claims of European powers to unpopulated areas in the new world were to be resolved, according to Vattel, in accordance with the precept of natural law (or, as we should say today, the precept of international morality) that no nation can "... exclusively appropriate to themselves more land than they have occasion for, or more than they are able to settle and cultivate." We do not, therefore, deviate from the views of nature in confining the Indians within narrow limits. However, we cannot help praising the moderation of the English puritans who first settled in New England, who, notwithstanding their being furnished with a charter from their sovereign, purchased of the Indians the land of which they intended to take possession. This laudable example was followed by William Penn, and the colony of Quakers that he conducted to Pennsylvania.

The basic issues in the field of aboriginal possessory right were first presented to the United States Supreme Court in the case of Johnson v. McIntosh.² Of the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall in that case, a leading writer on American consti-

¹ The significance of this concept is summarized in these words from the opinion in Deer v. State of New York, 22 F. 2d 851, 854 (D. C. N. D. N. Y., 1927):

"The source of title here is not letters patent or other form of grant by the federal government. Title the Indians claim in the land, arising from their white occupation, and recognized and protected by treaties between Great Britain and the United States and between the United States and the Indians. By the treaty of 1763 between the United States and the Six Nations of Indians, and the treaty of 1790 between the United States, the state of New York, and the Seven Nations of Canada, the right of occupation of the lands in question by the Six Nations Indians, was not granted, but recognized and confirmed."

tional law remarks: "the principles there laid down have ever since been accepted as correct . . . in this case the plaintiffs claimed land under a grant by the chiefs of the Iroquois and Seneca Nations, and in the words of the opinion, 'the question is, whether this title can be recognized in the courts of the United States.'" In reaching the conclusion that the Indian titles did not enjoy and could not convey complete title to the soil, the Court analyzed in some detail the extent and origin of the Indians' possessory right. From this opinion the following pertinent excerpts are taken:

On the discovery of this immense continent, the great nations of Europe were eager to appropriate to themselves so much of it as they could respectively acquire. Its vast extent offered an ample field to the ambition and enterprise of all, and the character and reborn of its inhabitants afforded an apology for considering them as a people over whom the superior genius of Europe might claim an ascendancy. The pretensions of the old world found no difficulty in convincing themselves that they made ample compensation to the inhabitants of the new, by bestowing on them civilization and Christianity, in exchange for untamed independence. That, as they were all in pursuit of nearly the same object, it was necessary, in order to avoid conflicting settlements, and consequent war with each other, to establish a principle, which all should acknowledge as the law by which the right of acquisition, which they all rested, should be regulated as between themselves. This principle was that discovery gave title to the government by whose subjects, or by whose authority, it was made, against all other European governments, which title might be transmitted by possession.

The exclusion of all other Europeans, necessarily gave to the nation making the discovery the sole right of acquiring the soil from the natives, and establishing settlements upon it. It was a right with which no Europeans could interfere. It was a right which all asserted for themselves, and to the assertion of which, by others, all assented.

Those relations which were to exist between the discoverer and the natives, were to be regulated by themselves. The rights thus acquired being exclusive, no other power could interpose between them.

In the establishment of these relations, the rights of the original inhabitants were, in no instance, entirely disregarded, but were necessarily, to a considerable extent, impaired. They were admitted to be the rightful occupants of the soil, with a legal as well as just claim to retain possession of it, and to use it according to their own discretion; but their rights to complete sovereignty, as independent nations, were necessarily diminished, and their power to dispose of the soil at their own will to whomsoever they pleased, was denied by the original fundamental principle, that discovery gave exclusive title to those who made it.

While the different nations of Europe respected the right of the natives, as occupants, they asserted the ultimate dominion to be in themselves; and claimed and exercised, as a consequence of this ultimate dominion, a power to grant the soil, while yet in possession of the natives. These grants have been understood by all to convey a title to the grantees, subject only to the Indian right of occupancy.

The history of America, from its discovery to the present day, proves, we think, the universal recognition of these principles. (Pp 572-571.)

The United States, then, have unequivocally needed to that great and broad right by which its civilized inhabitants now hold this country. They hold, and assert in themselves, the title by which it was acquired. They maintain, as all others have maintained, that discovery gave an exclusive right to extinguish the Indian title of occupancy, either by purchase or by conquest; and gave also a right to such a degree of sovereignty as the circumstances of the people would allow them to exercise.

The power now possessed by the government of the United States to grant lands, reserved, while we were colonies, in the crown, to its grantees. The validity of the titles given by either has never been questioned in our courts. It has been exercised uniformly over territory in possession of the Indians. The existence of this power must necessarily the existence of any right which may conflict with and control it. An absolute title to lands cannot exist, at the same time, in different persons, or in different governments. An absolute, must be an exclusive title, or at least a title which excludes all others not compatible with it. All our institutions recognize the absolute title of the crown, subject only to the Indian right of occupancy, and recognize the absolute title of the crown to extinguish that right. This is incompatible with an absolute and complete title in the Indians.

We will not enter into the controversy, whether agriculturists, merchants, and manufacturers, have a right, on abstract principles, to expel hunters from the territory they possess, or to contract their limits. Compulsory gave a title which the courts of the country cannot deny, whatever the private and speculative opinions of individuals may be, respecting the original justice of the claim which has been successfully asserted. The British government, which was then our government, and whose rights have passed to the United States, asserted a title to all the lands occupied by Indians, within the chartered limits of the British colonies. It asserted also a limited sovereignty over them, and the exclusive right of extinguishing the title which occupancy gave to them. These claims have been maintained and established as far west as the River Mississippi, by the sword. The title to a vast portion of the lands we now hold, originates in them. It is not for the courts of this country to question the validity of this title, or to sustain one which is incompatible with it. (Pp 587-580.)

However extravagant the pretension of converting the discovery of an inhabited country into conquest may appear, if the principle has been asserted in the first instance, and afterwards maintained, if a country has been acquired and held under it, if the property of the great mass of the community originates in it, it becomes the law of the land, and cannot be questioned. So, too, with respect to the paramount principle, that the Indian inhabitants are to be considered merely as occupants, to be protected, indeed, while in peace, in the possession of their lands, but to be deemed menial of transferring the absolute title to others. However this restriction may be opposed to natural right, and to the usages of civilized nations; yet, if it be indispensable to that system under which the country has been settled, and he adapted to the actual condition of the two people, it may, perhaps, be supported by reason, and certainly cannot be rejected by courts of justice. (Pp 591-592.)

The limitations upon Indian rights emphasized by Chief Justice Marshall in his opinion in the McIntosh case were supplemented a few years later by a second notable opinion of the Chief Justice emphasizing the positive content of the Indian possessory right. In the case of Worcester v. Georgia,¹ which dealt with the constitutionality of action by the State of Georgia leading to the imprisonment of individuals admitted to residence in the Cherokee Reservation by the authorities of that nation and by the United States, the Supreme Court took occasion again to analyze in detail the extent of the Indian right in the soil of the Cherokee Nation. "It is difficult," the Chief Justice ironically noted " . . . to comprehend the proposition, that the inhabitants of either quarter of the globe could have rightful original claims of dominion over the inhabitants of the other, or over the lands they occupied, or that the discovery of either by the other should give the discoverer rights in the country discovered, which annulled the pre-existing rights of its ancient possessors."

But power, war, conquest, gave rights which, after possession, are conceded by the world, and which can never be controverted by those on whom they descend" (P 343.)

"The great maritime powers of Europe," the Chief Justice observed, agreed upon the mutually advantageous rule, formulated in the Meinush case "that discovery gave title to the government by whose subjects or by whose authority it was made, against all other European governments, which title might be consummated by possession." 8 Wheat 333 (P 343-4.)

Such a rule, however, bound the European governments, but not the Indian tribes.

This principle, acknowledged by all Europeans, because it was the interest of all to acknowledge it, gave to the nation making the discovery, as its inevitable consequence, the sole right of acquiring the soil and of making settlements on it. It was an exclusive principle which shut out the right of competition among those who had agreed to it, not one which could annul the previous rights of those who had not agreed to it. It regulated the right given by discovery among the European discoverers, but could not affect the rights of those already in possession, either as aboriginal occupants, or as occupants in virtue of a discovery made before the memory of man. It gave the exclusive right to purchase, but did not found that right on a denial of the right of the possessor to sell.

The relation between the Europeans and the natives was determined in each case by the particular government which issued and could maintain this preemptive privilege in the particular place. The United States have conceded to all the claims of Great Britain, both territorial and political, but no attempt, so far as is known, has been made to evict them. So far as they existed merely in theory, or were in then native only exclusive of the claims of other European nations, they still remain their original character, and remain dominant. So far as they have been practically evicted, they exist in fact, are understood by both parties, are asserted by the one, and admitted by the other.

Soon after Great Britain determined on planting colonies in America, the king granted charters to companies of his subjects, who associated for the purpose of carrying the views of the crown into effect, and of enriching themselves. The first of these charters was made before possession was taken of any part of the country. They purport, generally, to convey the soil, from the Atlantic to the South Sea. This soil was occupied by numerous and warlike nations, equally willing and able to defend their possessions. The extravagant and absurd idea, that the feeble settlements made on the sea-coast, or the companies under whom they were made, acquired legitimate power by them to govern the people, to occupy the lands from sea to sea, did not enter the mind of any man. They were well understood to convey the title which, according to the common law of European sovereigns respecting America, they might rightfully convey, and no more. This was the exclusive right of purchasing such lands as the natives were willing to sell. The crown could not be understood to grant what the crown did not affect to claim, nor was it so understood. (P 344-545.)

Viewing the problem in these terms, the Supreme Court had no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that a possessory right to the area concerned was vested in the Cherokee Nation and that the State of Georgia had no authority to enter upon the Cherokee lands without the consent of the Cherokee Nation. These views were confirmed by the Supreme Court, per Chief Justice, in the subsequent case of Worcester v. Georgia.

Enough has already been remarked to show that the lands conveyed to the United States by the treaty were held by the Cherokees under their original title, acquired by immemorial possession, commencing ages before the New World was known to civilized man. Unmistakably their title was absolute, subject only to the pre-emption right of purchase acquired by the United States as the successors of Great Britain, and the right also on their part as such successors of the discoverer to prohibit the sale of the land to any other governments or their subjects, and to exclude all other governments from any interference in their affairs.*

Mitchell et al. v. United States* 9 Peters, 748.

A similar view of the aboriginal Indian title was taken by the Attorney General in answering the question whether a certain Mr. Ogden, owner of the reservation land in Seneca Indian lands, might lawfully enter these lands for the purpose of making a survey. In answering this question in the negative, Attorney General Wirt declared:

The answer to this question depends on the character of the title which the Indians retain in these lands. The practical admission of the European conquerors of this country renders it unnecessary for us to speculate on the extent of that right which they might have asserted from conquest, and from the barbarous habits and hostile state of its aboriginal occupants. (See the authorities cited in Fletcher and Rock, 6 Cranch, 121.) The conquerors have never claimed more than the exclusive right of purchase from the Indians, and the right of succession to a title which shall have remained voluntarily, or become extinguished by death, so long as a tribe exists and remains in possession of its lands, its title and possession are sovereign and exclusive, and there exists no authority to enter upon their lands, for any purpose whatever, without their consent. * * * Although the Indian title continues only during their possession, yet that possession has been always held sacred, and is never to be disturbed but by their consent. They do not hold under the States, nor under the United States, their title is original, sovereign, and exclusive. We treat with them as separate sovereignties, and while an Indian Nation continues to exist without its acknowledged limits, we have no more right to enter upon their territory, without their consent, than we have to enter upon the territory of a foreign prince.

It is said that the act of ownership proposed to be exercised by the grantee, under the State of Massachusetts will not injure the Indians, nor disturb them in the usual enjoyment of these lands, but of this the Indians, whose title, while it continues, is sovereign and exclusive, are the proper and the only judges.

I am of opinion that it is inconsistent, both with the character of the Indian title and the stipulations of their treaty, to enter upon these lands, for the purpose of making the proposed survey, without the consent of the Indians, freely rendered, and on a full understanding of the case. * (P 490-491.)

Cases and opinions subsequent to the Meinush case oscillate between a stress on the content of the Indian possessory right and stress on the limitations of that right. These opinions and cases might perhaps be classified according to whether they refer to the Indian right of occupancy as a "mere" right of occupancy or as a "sacred" right of occupancy. All the cases, however, agree in saying that the aboriginal Indian title involves an exclusive right of occupancy and does not involve an ultimate fee. The cases dealing with Indian lands in the territory of the original colonies locate the ultimate fee in the state wherein the lands are situated.* Outside of the territory of the original colonies, the ultimate fee is located in the United States and may be granted to individuals subject to the Indian right of occupancy.⁸

The question of what evidentiary facts must be shown to establish the aboriginal possession described in the foregoing opinions would carry us beyond the limits of this volume, but certain elementary principles are readily established. It has been held that title by aboriginal possession is not established by proof that an area was used for hunting purposes where other tribes also hunted on the lands in question.⁹

Where exclusive occupancy over a considerable period is shown, rights of possession are not lost by forced abandonment.¹⁰ In the words of the Court of Claims,

The Supreme Court has repeatedly held that the Indians' claim of right of occupancy of lands is dependent upon actual and exclusive possession. Mitchell v. United States, 5 U. S. 471 711. Williams v. Chicago, 242 U. S. 834. Cherokee Nation v. United States, 34 C. Cls. 17. Beyond doubt, abandonment of claimed Indian territory by the Indians will extinguish Indian title. In this case the Government interposes the doctrine of abandonment, asserting that the facts sustain the contention. It is of course conceded that the issue of abandonment is one of intention to relinquish, surrender, and unreservedly give up all claims to title to the lands described in the treaty, and the source from which it arose at such an intention is the facts and circumstances of the transaction involved. Forcible ejection from the premises, or nonuser under certain circumstances, as well as lapse of time, are not standing alone sufficient to warrant an abandonment. Wish v. Taylor, 38 L. R. SECTION 5. TREATY RESERVATIONS

The various ways in which treaty reservations have been established and the different forms of language used in defining the terms by which such reservations are held, together with the judicial and administrative interpretations placed upon these phrases, have been noted in some detail in Chapter 3, and need not be repeated here. It is enough for our present purposes merely to list (a) the principal ways in which treaty reservations have been established; (b) the principal forms of language used in defining tribal tenure; and (c) the more important rules of interpretation placed upon such phraseology.

A. METHODS OF ESTABLISHING TREATY RESERVATIONS

In general, three methods of establishing tribal ownership of lands by treaty were in common use: (1) the recognition of aboriginal title; (2) the exchange of lands; and (3) the purchase of lands.

(1) Usually the first treaty made by the United States with a given tribe recognizes the aboriginal possession of the tribe and defines its geographical extent. When this geographical extent has been defined by treaty with another sovereign, the treaty with the United States may simply confirm such prior definition. Thus, the first published Indian treaty, that of September 17, 1778, with the Delaware Nation,¹¹ provides:

Whereas the enemies of the United States have endeavored, by every artifice in their power, to possess the Indians in general with an opinion, that it is the design of the States aforesaid, to expatriate the Indians and take possession of their country: to obviate such false suggestion, the United States do engage to guarantee to the aforesaid nation of Delawares, and their heirs, all their territorial rights in the fullest and most ample manner, as it hath been bounded by former treaties; * * * as long as they the said Delawares nation shall abide by, and hold fast the chain of friendship now entered into

A typical treaty fixed a "boundary line between the United States, and the Wamundet and Delaware nations."¹²

In many treaties the recognition of aboriginal title was coupled with a cession of portions of the aboriginal domain.¹³ Thus, Article 6 of the Treaty of January 31, 1780, with the Shawanoe Nation,¹⁴ provides:

The United States do allot to the Shawanoe nation, lands within their territory to live and hunt upon, beginning at * * *, beyond which line none of the citizens of the United States shall settle, nor disturb the Shawanoe in their settlement and possessions; and the Shawanoe do relinquish to the United States, all title, or pretence of title, they ever had to the lands east, west, and south, of the east, west and south lines before described.

In some of those treaties the tribe was given a right at a future date to select from the ceded portions additional land for reservation purposes.¹⁵

(2) A second method of establishing tribal land ownership by treaty was through the exchange of lands held in aboriginal possession for other lands, which the United States promised to grant to the tribe.¹⁶ A typical treaty of this type is that of

¹² Treaty of August 3, 1765, with the Wyandotte, Delaware, Shawanoe, Ottawa, Chippewa, Potawatomi, Miami, Red River, Weas, Kickapoo, Piankeshaw, and Kaskaskia, 7 Stat. 49; Treaty of May 31, 1790, with the Seven Nations of Canada, 7 Stat. 55; Treaty of July 2, 1791, with the Cherokee Nation, 7 Stat. 80, 84; ("The United States solemnly guarantee to the Cherokee nation all their lands not hereby ceded"); Treaty of October 17, 1802, with the Choctaw Nation, 7 Stat. 78; Treaty of December 30, 1805, with the Chickasaw, 7 Stat. 100; Treaty of November 17, 1807, with the Ottawa, Chippewa, Wyandotte and Potawatomi Nations, 7 Stat. 105; Treaty of August 24, 1818, with the Quapaw Tribe, 7 Stat. 170; Treaty of September 24, 1819, with the Chippewa Nation, 7 Stat. 203; Treaty of September 18, 1823, with the Florida Tribes, 7 Stat. 224; Treaty of June 4, 1825, with the Great and Little Osage Tribes, 7 Stat. 240; Treaty of June 3, 1825, with the Kansas Nation, 7 Stat. 244; Treaty of October 28, 1826, with the Miami Tribe, 7 Stat. 800.

¹⁴ Art. 6, 7 Stat. 18.

¹⁵ The "fourth feature" referred to in this article were treaties with the British Crown and with the Colonies. A similar reference is made in the Treaty of December 17, 1801, with the Choctaw Nation, Art. 8, 7 Stat. 60. ("The two contracting parties covenant and agree that the old line of demarcation heretofore established by and between the officers of his Britannic Majesty and the Choctaw nation * * * shall be retraced and plainly marked, * * * and that the line shall be the boundary between the settlements of the Mississippi Territory and the Choctaw nation.")

¹⁶ Treaty of September 20, 1817, with the Wyandotte, Seneca, Delaware, Shawanoe, Potawatomi, Ottawa, and Chippewa Tribes, 7 Stat. 180;

October 3, 1818, with the Delaware Nation.¹⁶ The first two articles of this treaty provided

ART. 1 The Delaware nation of Indians cede to the United States all their claim to land in the state of Indiana.

ART. 2 In consideration of the aforesaid cession, the United States agree to provide for the Delaware a country to reside in, upon the west side of the Mississippi, and to guarantee to them the peaceful possession of the same.

This type of exchange is characteristic of the "removal" treaties whereby many of the eastern and central tribes were induced to move westward.¹⁷

Another type of treaty wherein an aboriginal domain is ceded to the United States in exchange for other lands, uses where a particular tribe combines with another and cedes to the United States its land in exchange for the privilege of participating in the reservation privileges accorded the other tribe.¹⁸ Yet another variation combines the two foregoing basic methods. A typical treaty of this type is that of July 8, 1817, with the Cherokee Nation,¹⁹ wherein it was provided that a portion of the aboriginal lands be ceded in exchange for lands west of the Mississippi but that a portion be retained for those Indians not desirous of migrating west.²⁰

(3) A third type of treaty provision for the establishing of reservations, frequently connected with the above two methods, directed the purchase of lands on behalf of the tribe. Generally tribal funds were utilized for such purchase and the purchase was made either from the United States or from another tribe. A typical provision of this type is the following, taken from the Treaty of March 21, 1800, with the Seminoles

" * * * The United States having obtained by grant of the Creek Indians the twenty half of their lands, hereby grant to the Seminoles nation the portion thereof hereafter described. * * * In consideration of said cession of two hundred thousand acres of land described above, the Seminole nation agrees to pay therefor the price of fifty cents per acre, amounting to the sum of one hundred thousand dollars, which amount shall be deducted from the sum paid by the United States for Seminoles lands under the stipulations above written."²¹

B TREATY DEFINITIONS OF TRIBAL PROPERTY RIGHTS

The language used to define the character of the estate guaranteed to an Indian tribe varies so considerably that any detailed classification is likely to be nearly useless. It is possible, however, to distinguish five general types of language commonly utilized.

(1) In a number of treaties the United States undertakes to grant to the tribe concerned a patent in fee simple.²² In some cases reference is made to the tribe "and their descendants,"²³ in a few cases the terms "patent" and "fee simple" are coupled with language indicating that if the tribe ceases to exist as an entity the land will revert or escheat to the United States.²⁴ In some cases express provision is made restricting alienation.²⁵ Occasionally the language of the ordinary patent or deed in fee simple is embellished with guarantees preserving the permanent character of the tenure, as in the following language, taken from the Treaty of May 6, 1828, with the Cherokee Nation.²⁶

" * * * a permanent home and which shall, under the most solemn guarantee of the United States, be, and remain, theirs forever—a home that shall never, in all future time, be embroiled by having extended around it the lines, or placed over it the jurisdiction of a Territory or State, nor be passed upon by the extension, in any way, of any of the limits of any existing Territory or State."

(2) Other treaties guaranteed ownership or possession, or permanent possession, without using the technical language of the typical patent or grant in fee simple.²⁷ Thus, for instance,

"Treaty of March 17, 1842, with the Wyandott Nation, 11 Stat. 581 ("both of these covenants to be made in fee simple to the Wyandott, and to their heirs forever"). And see Chapter 9, see 4.

"Treaty of December 29, 1835, with the Cherokee Tribe, 7 Stat. 478 ("The United States * * * hereby covenant and agree to convey to the said Indians, and their descendants by patent, in fee simple * * *").

"Treaty of September 20, 1816, with the Chickasaw Nation, 7 Stat. 150; Treaty of September 27, 1810, with the Choctaw Nation, 7 Stat. 353 ("in fee simple to them and their descendants, to assure to them while they shall exist, is a nation and live on it"), Treaty of February 28, 1831, with the Seneca Tribe, 7 Stat. 948; Treaty of July 20, 1831, with the Mixed Band of Seneca and Shawnee Indians, 7 Stat. 861; Treaty of August 8, 1831, with the Shawnee Tribe, 7 Stat. 355; Treaty of August 30, 1831, with the Ottawa Indians, 7 Stat. 800; Treaty of February 24, 1831, with the Creek Nation, Art. 4, 7 Stat. 417 ("The United States will grant a patent in fee simple, to the Creek nation of Indians * * * and the right thus guaranteed by the United States shall be continued to said tribe of Indians, so long as they shall exist as a nation, and continue to occupy the country hereby assigned them").

"Treaty of December 29, 1835, with the United Nation of Seneca and Shawnee Indians, 7 Stat. 411, 412 ("The said patents shall be granted in fee simple, but the lands shall not be sold or ceded without the consent of the United States"), of Treaty of July 30, 1810, and July 10, 1820, with the Kickapoo Tribe, 7 Stat. 800, 808 ("to them, and their heirs for ever * * * Provided, nevertheless, that the said tribe shall never sell the said land without the consent of the President of the United States").

²² 7 Stat. 811.

²³ Treaty of September 24, 1820, with the Delaware Indians, 7 Stat. 327 ("And the United States hereby pledges the faith of the government to guarantee to the said Delaware Nation forever, the quiet and peaceable possession and undisturbed enjoyment of the same, against the claims and assaults of all and every other people whatsoever"). Treaty of October 11, 1842, with the Confederated Tribes of Sac and Fox, 7 Stat. 596 ("to the Sac and Foxes for a permanent and perpetual residence for them and their descendants * * *"). Treaty of August 8, 1831, with the Wyandott, Delaware, Shawnee, Ottawa, Chickasaw, Potawatomi, Miami, Seneca, Winnebago, Kickapoo, Pottawatomie, and Kaskaskia Tribes, 7 Stat. 40, 52 ("The Indian tribes who have a right to those lands, are quietly to enjoy them, hunting, planting, and dwelling thereon so long as they please * * *"). Treaty of October 24, 1832, with the Kickapoo Tribe, 7 Stat. 861 ("and secured by the United States, to the said Kickapoo tribe, as their permanent residence").

Article 4 of the Treaty of August 18, 1803, with the Delaware Nation "recognized the Delawares "as the rightful owners of all the country which is bounded

(3) Various other treaties used language which it literally restricted restrict the Indian possession to a particular form of land inheritance, but which may be construed as an outright grant in nontribal language. Philosophy of this sort was analyzed by Marshall, C. J., in Worcester v. Georgia, where he noted that the use of the term "inherent rights" in describing the country guaranteed to the Choctawes did not mean that the land could not be used for the establishment of villages or the planting of cornfields.

(4) Particularly in the later treaties, phrases such as "use and occupancy" are increasingly utilized.⁸⁴

(5) Finally a number of treaties dodge the problem of defining the Indian estate by providing that specified lands shall be held "as Indian lands are held,"⁸⁵ or as an Indian reservation,⁸⁶ thus removing the fact that considerable differences may exist with respect to the tenures by which various tribes hold their land.

C PRINCIPLES OF TREATY INTERPRETATION

Apart from general principles of treaty interpretation discussed in Chapter 3, certain holdings with respect to the interpretation of treaty provisions establishing tribal land ownership deserve special note at this position against the notion that all Indian treaty reservations are held under a single form of ownership, one may note the comment of the Court of Claims in the case of Crow Nation v. United States:⁸⁷

* * * the title derived by an Indian tribe, through the setting apart of a reservation, depends entirely upon the terms of the treaty which is entered into between the parties and that, where there is simply a reservation set apart for the Indian Nation, no fee simple or lease fee is granted to the tribe, but only a right of occupancy.

(2) The question whether a treaty incorporates a grant in present, or in executory promise, was considered in the case of the New York Indians v. United States.⁸⁸ Although the treaty used the words "agreed to set apart," the court held that the context and circumstances showed that the treaty was understood to effectuate a grant in present.⁸⁹

(3) It has been held that the mere use of the term "grant" in Indian treaties does not indicate an intent to establish fee simple tenure.⁹⁰

(4) Likewise, it has been held that the language of a "grant" does not necessarily evidence a desire to grant new property rights but may constitute simply a method of defining and reserving aboriginal rights.⁹¹

(5) Where the United States has made a treaty promise that certain land "shall be confirmed by patent to the said Christian Indians, subject to such restrictions as Congress may provide,"⁹² and Congress has not provided any restrictions, the tribe is entitled to receive an ordinary patent granting title in fee simple, rather than "the usual Indian title."⁹³

Other questions of the interpretation of treaty clauses are considered in later portions of this chapter, particularly in sections 12 to 16, and in Chapter 3, section 2.

It is doubtful whether any broad principles of interpretation that would be at all useful can be derived from the cases in this field, but in subsequent sections of this chapter we shall be concerned to analyze specific questions concerning the nature of the estate granted by the various phrases classified in the foregoing sections.

SECTION 6. STATUTORY RESERVATIONS

Spontaneously during the treaty-making period and regularly since its expiration, tribal property rights in land have been established by specific acts of Congress. These acts vary from specific grants of fee simple rights to broad designations that a given area shall be used for the benefit of Indians, or that Indian occupancy of designated areas shall be respected by third parties. Legislation establishing Indian reservations follows various patterns.

(1) Perhaps the most common type of such legislation today is that which reserves a portion of the public domain from entry or sale and dedicates the reserved area to Indian use. The designated area is "set aside" or "reserved" for a given tribe, band, or group of Indians.⁹⁷ Frequently the statute uses the phrase "reserved for the sole use and occupancy"¹⁰ or some similar phrase.¹¹ Other statutes of this type provide that designated lands shall be "reserved as additions to" named reservations,¹² or, that the boundaries of a de-designated reservation are extended to include "specified lands."¹³ Occasionally the public lands so set aside are lands which have previously been used for another purpose and the prior purpose may be mentioned in the statute.¹⁴ In some of the statutes the designation of the Indian beneficiaries of the reservation is established or delegated to administrative discretion. These statutes typically provide that given lands shall be reserved for the use and occupancy of certain named bands of tribes "and such other Indians as the Secretary of the Interior may see fit to settle thereon."¹⁵ native, tribal funds of the tribe benefited.¹⁸ Some of these statutes authorize the purchase of land for Indians without using the word "reservation."¹⁹ Since the decision of the Supreme Court in United States v. Alchotta,²⁰ it has been clear that there is no name in the word "reservation" and that land purchased for Indian use and occupancy is a "reservation," at least within the meaning of the Indian liquor laws, whether or not the statute uses the term. Although the issue presented in the Alchotta case was one of criminal jurisdiction rather than of property right, the views therein expressed appear to be pertinent to the denotation of tribal property as to the delimitation of federal jurisdiction. The Court declared, per Black, J. "It is immaterial whether Congress designates a settlement as a 'reservation' or 'colony'" (p. 538, 539). The Court, quoting from its earlier opinion in United States v. Peltier,²¹ indicated that the important issue was whether the land had "been validly set apart for the use of the Indians as such, under the superintendence of the Government" (p. 539). The determination of this question requires an ascertainment of the purposes underlying the particular legislation, to which end consideration may be given to committee hearings and reports (p. 537).

(2) Another and distinct type of statute authorizes the purchase either by voluntary sale or in condemnation¹⁶ of private lands for Indian use, and allocates the cost funds in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated,¹⁷ or, in the altered

(3) In addition to the two major methods of establishing Indian reservations by statute, public land withdrawal and purchase of private land, a third method, the surrender of private lands in exchange for public lands, is followed in a number of statutes. A typical statute is that of June 14, 1884,²² commonly known as the Arizona Navajo Homestead Act, which authorizes the Secretary of the Interior in his discretion to accept relinquishments and reconveyances to the United States of such privately owned lands as in his opinion are desirable for, and should be reserved for the use and benefit of, a particular tribe of Indians, "so that the lands retained for Indian purposes may be consolidated and held in a solid area in far as may be possible."²³ Upon conveyance to the United States of a good and sufficient title to such privately owned land, the owners thereof, or their assigns, are authorized under regulations of the Secretary of the Interior, to select lands approximately equal in value to the lands thus conveyed. Similar in effect are statutes authorizing the grant of public lands to a state in exchange for the relinquishment of state lands to Indian use.²⁴

Various combinations,¹⁰ as well as minor variations,¹¹ of the foregoing three basic methods have been used in other statutes.

(4) District mention should be made of "reservation removal" statutes which authorize the sale of reservation lands and the removal of the proceeds of such sale in the acquisition of new lands for the benefit of the tribe concerned.¹² Generally such statute provide for the consent of the Indians.¹³

(5) A fifth type of statute establishing tribal property in reservation lands involves the restoration to a tribe of lands previously removed from tribal ownership.¹⁴

(6) A sixth source of tribal title is congressional legislation approving voluntary transfers of lands by another tribe,¹⁵ State,¹⁶ or individual.¹⁷

(7) Finally, it should be noted that tribal ownership is frequently confirmed, if not created in allotment and cession acts with respect to lands withheld from allotment or cession.¹⁸

A LEGISLATIVE DEFINITIONS OF TRIBAL PROPERTY RIGHTS

The foregoing statutes, except as otherwise noted, generally provide for the establishment of tribal lands, or reservations, without defining the precise character of the tribal interest therein. Certain statutes, however, seek to define precisely the extent of such tribal interest.

A number of these statutes, for instance, specify that a fee-simple title shall be vested in the Indian tribe.²⁰ Of particular importance in this category are the statutes authorizing the patenting of land to the Pueblos of New Mexico and to the Mission Bands of California Indians. The former of these statutes²¹ is analyzed in Chapter 20, section 6, of this volume. The latter statute²² directed the Secretary of the Interior to appoint three commissioners (see 1) for the purpose of selecting

. . . a reservation for each band or village of the Mission Indians residing within said State, which reservation shall include, as far as practicable, the lands and interests which have been or may be the actual occupation and possession of said Indians, and which shall be sufficient in extent to meet their just requirements, which selection shall be made when approved by the President and Secretary of the Interior. (Sec. 2)

The Secretary of the Interior was directed to issue a patent in each of the reservations,

. . . which patents shall be of the legal effect, and declare that the United States doth and will hold the land thus patented, subject to the provisions of section 204 of this Act, for the period of twenty-five years, in trust, for the sole use and benefit of the band or village to which it is issued and that at the expiration of said period the United States will convey the same or the remaining portion not previously patented in severally by patent to said land or village, discharged of said trust, and free of all charge or incumbrance whatsoever . . . (Sec. 3)

The Secretary of the Interior was further authorized to cause allotments to be made out of such reservation land to any Indian residing upon such patented land who shall be so advanced in civilization as to be capable of owning and managing land in severally (see 4). Individual patents were to "override" the group patent (see 5). The Attorney General was directed to

The provisions of this legislation have been modified in certain respects by later enactments¹⁴ and have been incorporated by reference in a number of subsequent acts dealing with the Mexican Indians of California.¹⁵

While the foregoing statutes may be construed to grant an estate greater than the ordinary tribal title, there are other statutes which signify continue the interest of the Indians in a given tract by specifying the particular purpose for which the tract is to be used.¹⁶ Other statutes specify that the land is

SECTION 7. EXECUTIVE ORDER RESERVATIONS

Although the practice of establishing Indian reservations by Executive order goes back at least to May 18, 1815,¹⁸ the practice rested on an uncertain legislative foundation prior to the General Allotment Act.¹⁹ In fact, so uncertain was the legislative foundation for the exercising of the power by the Executive that the Attorney General in upholding its legality in an opinion rendered in 1882, did so chiefly on the basis that the practice had been followed for many years and Congress had never objected.²⁰

Questions as to the validity of already established Executive order reservations were settled²¹ by the language of the General Allotment Act which referred to "any reservation created for them use, either by treaty stipulation or by virtue of an Act of Congress or Executive order setting apart the same for their use . . ." (see 1). The view that Executive order reservations have exactly the same validity and status as any other type of reservation is expressed in a carefully documented opinion of Attorney General Stone, rendered with respect to the validity of attempts by Secretary of the Interior Paul to dispose of minerals within Executive order Indian reservations under the laws governing minerals within the public domain. In holding the proposed practice to be illegal, the Attorney General declared:

That the President had authority at the date of the orders to withdraw public lands and set them apart for the benefit of the Indians, or for other public purposes, is now settled beyond the possibility of controversy. United States v. Mescalito Oil Co., 238 U. S. 459, Mason v. United States, 280 U. S. 545. And aside from this, the General Indian Allotment Act of February 8, 1887 (21 Stat. 358, Sec. 1), clearly recognizes and by necessary implication confirms Indian reservations "herebefore" or "hereafter" established by executive order.

Whether the President might legally abolish, in whole or in part, Indian reservations once created by him, has been seriously questioned (12 L. D. 205, 18 L. D. 628) and not without strong reason, for the Indian rights attach when the lands are first set aside, and moreover, the lands then at once become subject to allotment under the General Allotment Act. Nevertheless, the President has in fact, and in a number of instances, changed the boundaries of executive order Indian reservations by excluding lands therefrom, and the question of his authority to do so has not apparently come before the courts.

When, by an executive order, public lands are set aside, either as a new Indian reservation or in addition to an old one without further language indicating that the action is a mere temporary expedient, such lands are thereafter properly known and designated as an "Indian reservation," and so long, at least, as the order continues in force, the Indians have the title in fee and occupancy and use and the United States has the title in fee. Spaulding v. Chandler, 160 U. S. 84, In re Crow, 140 U. S. 870.

But a right of "occupancy" or "possession and use" in the Indians with the fee title in the sovereign (the Crown, the original States, the United States) in the same condition of title which has prevailed in this country from the beginning, except in a few instances like those of the Choctaws and Chickasaws, who received patents for their new tribal lands on removing to the West. And the Indian right of occupancy is as sacred as the fee title of the sovereign.

The courts have applied this legal theory indiscriminately to lands subject to the original Indian occupancy, to reservations resulting from the cession by Indians of part of their original lands, and the retention of the remainder, to reservations established in the West in exchange for lands in the East, and to reservations created by treaty, Act of Congress, or executive order, out of "public lands." The rights of the Indians were always those of occupancy and use and the fee was in the United States. Johnson v. McIntosh, 8 Wheat. 543, Mitchell v. United States, 9 Pet. 711, 745, United States v. Cook, 10 Wall. 592, Leavenworth, etc. R. R. Co. v. United States, 92 U. S. 733, 742, Somerset National Bank v. United States, 92 U. ²⁰Indian Reservations, 17 Op. A. G. 268 (1882). In 1887 the Attorney General ruled that an act of Congress would be necessary in order to establish a reservation in Alaska for Indians emigrating from Canada since the President's "power to declare permanent reservation for Indians to the exclusion of others on the public domain does not extend to Indians not born or resident in the United States." 18 Op. A. G. 697, 699 (1887).

Spalding v. Chandler, 100 U.S. 8, 334, 11 F. Cas. 101 (1873); Gibson v. Anderson, 131 Fed. 2d 39.

In Spalding v. Chandler, supra, which involved an executive order Indian reservation, the Supreme Court said (pp. 402, 403):

"It has been settled by repeated adjudications of this court that the fee of the land in this country is the original acquisition of the Indian tribes, was from the time of the formation of this government vested in the United States. The Indian title as against the United States was merely a title and right to the perpetual occupancy of the land with the privilege of using it in such manner as they saw fit and such right of occupation had been surrendered to the government. When Indian reservations were created, either by treaty or executive order, the Indians held the land by the same character of title, in fact, the right to possess and occupy the lands for the uses and purposes designated."

In U'Fadden v. Mountain View M. & M. Co., supra, the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit said (p. 673):

"On the 9th day of April, 1872, an executive order was issued by President Grant, by which was set apart as a reservation for certain specified Indians, and for such other Indians as the department of the interior should see fit to locate thereon, a certain scope of country bounded on the east and south by the Columbia River, on the west by the Okanum river, and on the north by the British possessions, theretofore known as the 'Koville Indian Reservation.' There can be no doubt of the power of the president to reserve those lands of the United States for the use of the Indians. The effect of that executive order was the same as would have been a treaty with the Indians for the same purpose, and was to exclude all intruders upon the territory thus reserved by any and every person, other than the Indians for whose benefit the reservation was made, for mining as well as other purposes."

The latter decision was reversed by the Supreme Court and an entirely different ground (180 U.S. 8, 331) "The views expressed in the U'Fadden case were reaffirmed by the same court in Gibson v. Anderson, supra, involving a reservation created by executive order for the Muskane Indians."

The General Indian Allotment Act of February 8, 1887 (24 Stat. 888, Sec. 1), is based upon the same legal theory as the decisions of the courts; for it is expressly made applicable to "any reservation created by treaty or by treaty stipulation or by virtue of an Act of Congress or executive order setting apart the same for their use."

A few years after the foregoing opinion was rendered, the question raised by Attorney General Stone as to the propriety of modifying Executive order reservations by new Executive orders received its legislative answer in section 4 of the Act of March 8, 1927,¹³ which declared:

"That hereafter changes in the boundaries of reservations created by Executive order, proclamation, or otherwise for the use and occupancy of Indians shall not be made except by Act of Congress. Provided, That this shall not apply to temporary withdrawals by the Secretary of the Interior."

Some years earlier, a general prohibition against the creation of new Executive order reservations or new additions to existing reservations had been enacted, in these terms:

"That hereafter no public lands of the United States shall be withdrawn by Executive Order, proclamation, or otherwise, for or as an Indian reservation except by act of Congress."¹⁴

The foregoing statute, which terminates the practice of establishing Indian reservations by Executive order, remains in force to this day, except with respect to the Territory of Alaska, where it has been substantially repealed by section 2 of the Act of May 1, 1946.¹⁵ It may be argued that the procedure of establishing reservations by Executive order is authorized, pro tanto, by section 3 of the Act of June 18, 1834,¹⁶ which authorized the Secretary of the Interior to add to existing reservations by restoring to Indian ownership "the remaining surplus lands of any Indian reservation heretofore opened, or authorized to be opened, to sale, or any other land at disposal by the President's proclamation, or by any of the public laws and laws of the United States." Under this provision, it has been administratively held that the restoration of land must be for the benefit of the entire tribe that would, according to the terms of the cession, be entitled to receipts from the sale thereof, rather than to a fraction of the tribe to which the land formerly belonged.¹⁷

Executive orders setting apart public lands for Indian reservations or Indian use are by no means uniform. Perhaps the most common type of order is that which presumes to set apart a designated area for the use,¹⁸ or use and occupancy,¹⁹ or as a reservation.²⁰ For a particular tribe or tribes of Indians. Frequently the order uses the term "permanent use and occupancy."²¹ Other orders of this type provide that designated lands shall be 'set apart as additions to' named reservations,¹⁰ or, that the boundaries of a designated reservation are 'extended to include'¹¹ specified lands. Occasionally an order merely recites the boundary of the reservation if it appears to establish.¹² Another type of order restores theretofore reserved lands to the public domain and withdraws in lieu thereof certain designated land to be set apart for an Indian reservation,¹³ or as an addition to an established reservation.¹⁴ Various combinations of the foregoing types may be found in other orders.¹⁵

In some of the orders the designation of additional Indian beneficiaries of the reservation to be established is delegated to administrative discretion. These orders, typically, provide that given lands shall be set apart for the use and occupancy of certain named bands or tribes, and "such Indians as the Secretary of the Interior may see fit to locate therein."¹⁶ Under another type of order the land is withdrawn and set apart for an indefinite period, the duration of which is conditioned upon the happening of a named event. For example, the Executive order of November 14, 1901, provides that designated land be 'withdrawn from sale and settlement until such time as the [Navajo] Indians residing thereon shall have been settled permanently under the provisions of the homestead laws or the general allotment act.'¹⁷ Yet another type of order, merely provides that designated land be set apart for Indian purposes.¹⁸ In some cases a particular purpose is designated.¹⁹

It will be noted that the foregoing types of order are all similar in certain respects. In each it is decreed that certain designated land be set apart in a designated manner for a named purpose. In contrast to these is the type of Executive order which though it effects the same purpose, namely, the setting apart of designated land for a particular purpose, may more accurately be termed Executive approval than Executive order. The typical situation wherein this Executive approval is found arises where agents of the War or Interior Departments in their own discretion set aside designated lands and notify the Executive department of such action. In confirmation thereof the Executive may indicate his approval either by affixing his signature to the official notification or by issuing an order containing same.¹¹⁷ Needless to say this type of Executive order is of equal validity with the orders heretofore mentioned.¹¹⁸

Comparatively few questions have arisen as to the interpretation of Executive orders establishing Indian reservations. One such question was raised before the Court of Claims in the case of Crow Valley v. United States.¹¹⁹ According to that court, the phrase in controversy reserving an area to the Crow tribe "and such other Indians as the President may, from time to time, locate therein"¹²⁰ gave to the Crow tribe only the right to reside upon the reservation, so set apart by Executive order, and did not confer upon them any definite title or particular interest in the land. It was in the nature of a remedy by silence or residential title.¹²¹ The Executive order reserves to the President the right to put other Indians on the reservation and this could not be done if a statutory title, as tenements in common, was given to these five tribes alone. (Pp. 278, 280.)

Where an Executive order establishes an Indian reservation in an area previously reserved for reservoir purposes, it has been held that the later Executive order supercedes the earlier order.¹²²

It has been held that a reservation in the name of an Executive order reservation may be established without a formal Executive order if a course of administrative action is shown which had for its purpose the inducing of an Indian tribe to settle in a given area and if the area has thereafter been referred to and dealt with as an Indian reservation by the Executive branch of the Government.¹²³

Likewise it has been held that an Executive reservation may be created by administrative action prior to the formal issuance of an Executive order, the effect of such order being simply to give "formal sanction to what had been done before."¹²⁴

Occasionally a treaty leaves a good deal of discretion to administrative authorities in establishing a reservation, and the courts must look to administrative correspondence, maps, and other records to determine the date, extent, and character of the reservation. Here we are on the borderline between treaty and Executive order reservations.¹²⁵ In fact, the connection between treaty and Executive order is characteristic of many, if not most, of the early Executive orders and provides a legal basis of unquestioned validity for such Executive orders.¹²⁶

SECTION 8. TRIBAL LAND PURCHASE

That a tribe may acquire land in its own name as a consequence of its general contractual capacity, discussed in Chapter 14 of this volume. In the exercise of this capacity various tribes have, from time to time, purchased lands (using the term "purchase" in its technical sense to include acquisition through gift and devise as well as bargain and sale), and the validity of such purchases has been recognized legislatively¹²⁷ and judicially.¹²⁸

A notable instance of land acquisition is found in the history of the Eastern Band of Cherokee Indians of North Carolina. The individual members of the band had the foresight to provide that land purchased with individual funds should be held under a single title, first by a private trustee, then by the incorporated band, and finally (by cession from the band)¹²⁹ by the United States in trust for the band. Always resisting allotment, the band has maintained its lands intact, in sharp contrast to the fate of its fellow tribesmen in Oklahoma.¹³⁰

From time to time, the Secretary of the Interior has been authorized to purchase lands for Indian tribes. Such legislation, where specific, has been dealt with under the heading "Statutory Reservations." Where the legislation creates a general authority, the process of establishing reservations by purchase resembles the process whereby the tribe itself undertakes to acquire lands.

The acquisition of land by the Secretary of the Interior for an Indian tribe, through purchase, gift, exchange or assignment or through relinquishment of land by individual Indians, is authorized by section 5 of the Act of June 18, 1904.¹²⁴ It has been held that the purpose of "providing land for Indians" is served by an exchange transaction whereby an individual Indian transfers allotted land to the tribe in exchange for an assignment of occupancy rights in the same or in another tract, since the tribe through this transaction acquires a definite interest in the land over and above the transferor's retained occupancy right.¹²⁵ Where a tribe exchanges land with a non-Indian, under this section, the value of the land acquired must be equal to, or greater than, the value of the land ceded, since the purpose of section 5 is to increase the tribal estate rather than to open the way to its alienation.¹²⁶

Relinquishment of individual timber and mineral rights to the tribe have been made in consideration of other similar relinquishments by other members of the tribe.¹²⁷ The result of such a transaction is that each member of the tribe has an undivided interest in the entire mineral and timber wealth of the reservation, instead of a particular interest in the possible timber and mineral wealth of his own allotment.

It has been held that a tribe may purchase allotted lands in leasehold status where such lands are offered for sale by the Secretary of the Interior.¹²⁸ The mechanism of such a transaction is elsewhere discussed.¹²⁹

The acquisition of land by one tribe from another was at one time a common method of acquiring tribal property. The distinction between such a transfer and a transaction whereby one tribe is dissolved and its members incorporated in another tribe, is carefully analyzed by the Supreme Court in the case of Cherokee Nation v. Georgia.¹³⁰

For some time it was doubted whether land conveyed to an Indian tribe by private parties was within the protection of the Federal Government. These doubts were largely dispelled by the case of United States v. 1,055 Acres of Land,¹³¹ in which it was held that lands of the Eastern Cherokees of North Carolina were not subject to a claim of adverse possession. In an opinion which illuminates the subject, the court declared, per Parker, J.

As we were at pains to point out in the Wright Case, it makes no difference that title to the land in controversy was originally obtained by grant from the state of North Carolina, or that the Indians are citizens of that state and subject to its laws. The determinative fact is that the federal government has assumed towards them the same sort of guardianship that it exercises over other tribes of Indians, from which it results that their property becomes an instrumentality of that government for the accomplishment of a proper governmental purpose and may not be taken from them by contract, adverse possession, or otherwise, without its consent. United States v. Goudnow, 271 U. S. 482, 440, 46 S. Ct. 561, 563, 70 L. Ed. 1022; United States v. Almonaco, 270 U. S. 181, 196, 46 S. Ct. 298, 301, 70 L. Ed. 589; United States v. Bandolan, 281 U. S. 28, 34, 84 Ct. 1, 58 L. Ed. 107; Arceboan v. United States, 281 U. S. 413, 485, 50 S. Ct. 453, 456, 70 L. Ed. 809. Indeed a statute of the United States, expressly forbidding the acquisition of lands of any Indian tribe by purchase, grant, lease or other conveyance, except by treaty or convention and subjects to penalty anyone not being employed under the authority of the United States who attempts to negotiate such treaty. H. R. § 2110, 25 U. S. C. § 177. This statute protects Indians such as these as well as the nomadic tribes. United States v. Goudnow, supra. And the protection is not affected by section of the fact that the land has been incorporated under a state charter and attempts to take action thereunder. United States v. Bond, supra, 4 Ct. 93 F. 547, 63. Certainly if the land was not alienable by the Indians, title could not be obtained as against them by adverse possession. Nichols v. Barker, 183 U. S. 206, 295, 32 S. Ct. 107, 40 L. Ed. 203; Garcia v. United States, 30 Ct. 48 F. 2d 873. (Pp. 422-423).

If adverse possession will not give title under a state statute of limitation acquired by such parties to individual Indians, a fortiori such possession cannot give title to lands held in trust for the common benefit of the tribe over which the United States exercises guardianship. It is beyond the power of the state, either through its acts of limitation or adverse possession, to affect the interest of the United States, and the United States manifestly has an interest in preserving the property of these wards of the government for their use and benefit. As and in the Hickman Case, supra (32 S. Ct. page 481), "If these Indians may be divested of their lands they will be thrown back upon the Nation a pauperized, disoriented . . . people." The lands held for them are thus an instrumentality of the discharge of the duty which the government has assumed toward them. Title to it can no more be acquired by adverse possession under state statute, than to land held for other governmental purposes. (P. 423.)

A further step in accumulating the status of lands purchased for Indians to the status of treaty, Executive order, and statutory reservations was taken in the Act of February 14, 1923,¹³² which extended the provisions of the General Allotment Act¹³³ as amended, which in turn covered only reservations created "either by treaty stipulation or by virtue of an act of Congress or executive order setting apart the same for their use," to "all lands, heretofore purchased or which may hereafter be purchased by authority of Congress for the use or benefit of any individual Indian or band or tribe of Indians."

SECTION 9. TRIBAL TITLE DERIVED FROM OTHER SOVEREIGNTIES

The analysis of tribal rights in land is complicated by the fact that all of the territory of the United States (with the possible exception of Oregon territory) was at one time subject to some other sovereignty, and it has been the consistent policy of the United States to respect rights in real property recognized under such prior sovereignty. This policy, based upon international law,¹³⁴ has been affirmed in our various treaties with Spain, France, Great Britain, Mexico, and Russia. It would take us far beyond the limits of this volume to analyze in any detail the principles of Spanish, French, British, Mexican, and Russian law governing aboriginal title. It is necessary, however, to refer to the statutes and judicial decisions of this country which interpret the applicable principles of foreign law and mark out the authority which the courts of this Nation will accord to such principles.

In some measure the Spanish and Mexican law relating to the Pueblo of New Mexico and the Russian law relating to the natives of Alaska are dealt with in separate chapters²² and need not be discussed at this point. The relevance of Spanish and Mexican law is not, however, limited to the problems of the Pueblos of New Mexico. The cession of Florida and the land claims of unadmitted Indians in the later Mexican cessions often involve difficult questions of Spanish law.

The California Proyecto de Ley (June 1st of March 3, 1851),²³ provided a means for determining land titles established under Mexican law in Indian rights of permanent occupancy vested in Indian tribes. It has been held that claims not presented to the Commission established under this act have been waived, even though such claims emanate from Indian tribes not placed finally in a position to present them at the time when the commission was functioning.²⁴

The effect of Spanish and British law upon Indian rights within the Florida cession was analyzed by the Supreme Court in the case of Mitchell v. United States,²⁵ from which the following excerpts are taken:

We now come to consider the nature and extent of the Indian title to these lands.

As Florida was for 20 years under the dominion of Great Britain, the laws of that country were in force, the rule by which lands were held and sold, it will be necessary to examine what they were as applicable to the British provinces before the acquisition of the Florida by the treaty of peace in 1763. They were, in general, the same laws that existed among their first settlers, as appears in their laws. But typically Indians were protected in the possession of the lands they occupied, and were considered as owning them by a perpetual right of occupancy, the title or nation inhabiting them is then common property from generation to generation, not in the right of the individuals located on particular spots.

Subject to this right of possession, the ultimate fee was in the crown and its agents, which could be granted by the crown or colonial legislatures, while the lands remained in possession of the Indians, though possession could not be taken without their consent.

Individuals could not purchase Indian lands without permission or license from the crown, colonial governors, or according to the rules prescribed by colonial laws, but such purchases were valid with such license, or in conformity with the local laws, and by this means of the perpetual right of occupancy with the ultimate fee which passed from the crown by the license, the title of the purchaser became complete.

Indian possession or occupation was considered with reference to their habits and mode of life, their hunting-grounds were much in their actual possession as the cleared fields of the whites, and their rights in its exclusive enjoyment were their own property for their own purposes, were as much respected, until they abandoned them, made a cession to the government, or an authorized sale to individuals. In either case their right became extinct, the lands could be granted dismembered of the right of occupancy, or enjoyed in full dominion by the purchasers from the Indians. Such was the tenor of Indian laws by the laws of Massachusetts Indian Laws, 9, 10, 13, 14, 17, 18, 19, 21, in Connecticut, 40, 41, 42, Rhode Island, 22, 23, New Hampshire, 60, New York, 62, 64, 71, 85, 102; New Jersey, 183, Pennsylvania, 138, Maryland, 141, 143, 144, 145, Virginia, 147, 148, 169, 163, 164, North Carolina, 163, 4, 58, South Carolina, 178, 179, Georgia, 188, 187, by Congress, Appendix, 16, by their respective laws, and the decisions of courts in their construction. See cases collected in 2 Johnson's Dig. 16, 17, Indians and Wharrior's Dig. tit. Land, &c. 468. See, too, the view taken by the Court of Indian rights in the case of Johann v. McIntosh, 8 Wheat. 571, 604, which has received universal assent.

The merits of this case do not make it necessary to inquire whether the Indians within the United States held any other rights of soil or jurisdiction, it is enough to consider it as a settled principle, that they right of occupancy is considered as secured as the fee simple of the whites. 5 Fed. 48. The principles which had been established in the colonies were adopted by the king in the proclamation of October 1763, and applied to the provinces acquired by the treaty of peace and the lower limits in the several provinces, now composing the United States, as the law which should govern the enjoyment and transmission of Indian and vacant lands. After providing for the government of the acquired provinces, 7 Laws U. S. 13, 14, it authorizes the governors of Quebec, East and West Florida, to make grants of such lands as the king had power to dispose of upon such terms as have been used in other colonies, and such other conditions as the crown might deem necessary and expedient, without any other restriction. It also authorized warrants to be issued by the governors for military and naval services rendered in the then late war. It reserved to the Indians the possession of their lands and hunting-grounds, and prohibited the granting any warrant of survey, or patent for any lands west of the heads of the Atlantic waters, in which, not having been ceded or purchased by the crown, were reserved to the Indians, and prohibited all purchases from them without its special license. The warrants issued pursuant to this proclamation for lands then within the Indian boundary before the treaty of Pitts Newbeck's in 1763, have been held to pass the title to the lands conveyed on them, in opposition to a subsequent patent afterwards issued. Ross v. Linn, 3 Dallas, 427-430. And all titles held before the charter of license of the crown to purchase from the Indians have been held good, and the power has never been held to be given to the crown to grant being complete, this proclamation had the effect of a law in relation to such purchases, so it has been considered by this court in Whit v. Whit, 305-304. (Pp. 745-747.)²⁶

A classic historical account of the extent to which Indian rights were recognized under British and colonial rule is given by Chief Justice Marshall in his concurring opinion in Worcester v. Georgia.²⁷ After analyzing the claims of the European nations on the subject of aboriginal right,²⁸ the Chief Justice offered these comments on the colonial charters issued by the European powers and the recognition of Indian rights implicit in the language of these charters:

The power of making war is conferred by these charters on the colonies, but derivative war alone seems to have been contemplated. In the first charter to the first and second colonies, they are empowered, "for that several defenses, to encounter, engage, repel, and resist all persons who shall without license attempt to invade" "within the said precincts and limits of the said several colonies, or that shall enterprise or attempt at any time hereafter the best detriment or annoyance of the said several colonies, or plantations."²⁹

After analyzing various colonial charters, the court concluded:

These motives for planting the new colony are incompatible with the lofty ideas of granting the soil, and all its inhabitants from sea to sea. They demonstrate the truth that these grants asserted a title against Europeans only, and were considered as blank paper so far as the rights of the natives were concerned. The power of war is given only for defense, not for conquest.

The charters contain passages showing one of their objects to be the civilization of the Indians, and their conversion to Christianity, to be accomplished by "conducting a candid and good example, not by extermination."

The actual state of things, and the practice of European nations, on so much of the American continent as lies ²⁶ Apparently the Supreme Court was of the opinion that the principles applicable to Indian possessions in Florida under Spanish rule were not identical with those applicable to the Indians of California. By the Court declared that, to Spain, "the friendship of the Indians was a most important consideration. It would have been lost by adopting towards them a less liberal, just, or kind policy than had been pursued by Great Britain, or acting according to the laws of the Indies in force in Mexico and Peru." between the Mississippi and the Atlantic, explain their claims and the charters they granted. Their pretensions unavoidably interfered with each other, though the discovery of one was admitted by all to exclude the claim of any other, the extent of that discovery was the subject of unceasing contest. Bloody conflicts arose between them, which gave importance and security to the neighboring nations. Peace and warlike in their character, they might be formidable enemies, or obnoxious friends. Instead of joining their settlements in asserting claims to their lands, or to dominion over their persons, their alliance was sought by flattery, professions, and purchased by rich presents. The English, the French, and the Spaniards were equally competitors for their friendship and their aid. Not well acquainted with the exact meaning of words, nor supposing it to be material whether they were called the subjects, or the children of their fathers in Europe, lavish in professions, duty and affection, in return for the rich presents they received, so long as their actual independence was untouched, and then right to self-government acknowledged, they were willing to profess dependence on the power which furnished supplies, of which they were in absolute need, and rejected dangerous intruders from entering their country, and this was probably the sense in which the term was understood by them.

Certain it is that our history furnishes no example, from the first settlement of our country, of any attempt, on the part of the crown, to interfere with the internal affairs of the Indians, further than to keep out the agents of foreign powers, who, as traders or otherwise, mixed with them into foreign affairs. The king purchased their lands when they were willing to sell, at a price they were willing to take, but never coerced a surrender of them. He also purchased their alliance and dependence by subsidies, but never intruded into the interior of their affairs, or interfered with their self-government, so far as interested themselves only.

The general views of Great Britain, with regard to the Indians, were delineated by Mr. Stanist, superintendent of Indian affairs, in a speech delivered at Mobile, in presence of several persons of distinction, soon after the peace of 1763. Towards the conclusion, he says: "Lastly, I inform you that it is the king's order to all his governors and subjects, to treat Indians with justice and humanity, and to forbear all encroachments on the territories allotted to them, accordingly, all individuals are prohibited from purchasing any of your lands, but, as you know that, as you while in Indian cannot feel you when you visit them unless you give them ground to plant, it is expected that you will cede lands to the king for that purpose. But whenever you shall be pleased to surrender any of your territories to his Majesty, it must be by a formal deed, signed at a public meeting, when the governors of the provinces, or the superintendent shall be present, and obtain the consent of all your people. The boundaries of your hunting grounds will be accurately fixed, and no settlement permitted to be made upon them. As you may be assured that all treaties with your people will be faithfully kept, so it is expected that you, also, will be carefully strictly to observe them."

The proclamation issued by the king of Great Britain, in 1763, soon after the ratification of the articles of peace, forbids the governors of any of the colonies to grant warrants of survey, or pass patents upon any lands whatever, which, not having been ceded to or purchased by us, (the king), as aforesaid, are reserved to the said Indians, or any of them.

The proclamation proceeds: "And we do further declare it to be our royal will and pleasure, for the present, as aforesaid, to reserve under our sovereignty, protection, and dominion, for the use of the said Indians, all the lands and territories lying to the westward of the sources of the rivers which fall into the sea, from the west and northwest as aforesaid, and we do hereby strictly forbid, on pain of our displeasure, all our loving subjects from making any purchases or settlements whatever, or taking possession of any of the lands above reserved, without our special leave and license for that purpose first obtained."

"And we do further strictly forbid and require all persons whatever, who have, either wilfully or inadvertently, seated themselves upon any lands within the countries above described, or upon any other lands which, not having been ceded to or purchased by us, are still reserved to the said Indians, as aforesaid, forthwith to remove themselves from such settlements."

A proclamation, issued by Governor Gage, in 1772, contains the following passage: "Whereas many persons, contrary to the positive orders of the king, upon this subject, have undertaken to make settlements beyond the boundaries fixed by the treaties made with the Indian nations, which boundaries ought to serve as a barrier between the whites, and the said nations, particularly on the Ohio-bank." The proclamation orders such persons to quit these countries without delay.

Such was the policy of Great Britain towards the Indian nations inhabiting the territory from which she excluded all other Europeans, such her claims, and such her practical exposition of the charters she had granted, she considered them as nations capable of maintaining the relations of peace and war, of governing themselves, under her protection, and she made treaties with them, the obligation of which she acknowledged. (Pp. 646-649.)

The question of how far Spain and Mexico recognized rights of possession in nomadic tribes is a question upon which conflicting views have been expressed. In Hoyt v. United States and Utah Indians,¹³¹ the Court of Claims took the position that Spain and Mexico had never recognized any rights of exclusive possession in any of the nomadic tribes, and that only areas affirmatively designated as Indian reservations could be considered Indian country within the meaning of the Indian Intercourse Act of 1894. The actual decision in the case, however, was simply that a plaintiff was not precluded from maintaining a suit for depredations committed by the Indians by the mere fact that he was on territory which later became recognized as an Indian reservation. On the other hand, the Supreme Court, in the case of *Chouteau v. Motron*¹³² held that under the Spanish law applicable to what is now the State of Iowa when that territory was under Spanish dominion, the Fox tribe of Indians had rights of ownership in the land they occupied which were of such dignity that a purported grant of such land by the Spanish Governor would be * * * an unaccountable and capricious exercise of official power, contrary to the uniform usage of his predecessors in respect to the sales of Indian lands, and that it could give no property to the grantees. It is not meant, by what has just been said, that the Spanish governors could not relinquish the interest or title of the Crown in Indian lands and for more than a mile square, but when that was done, the grants were made subject to the rights of Indian occupancy. They did not take effect until that occupancy had ceased, and whilst it continued it was not in the power of the Spanish governor to authorize any one to interfere with it. (P. 289.)

Apparently the Foxes were as nomadic in their habits as most of the other Plains tribes, so that the correct historical view would seem to be that if Spanish law ever denied title by aboriginal occupancy to certain Indian tribes it was because these tribes did not in fact maintain exclusive occupancy of any territory at all but merely wandered over lands which were traversed by other tribes as well. In this situation even our own law recognizes that no possessory rights are created.¹³³ There would seem, therefore, to be no valid reason to suppose that the Spanish law was more rigorous than the law of Great Britain on the United States with respect to the recognition of Indian possessory rights derived from aboriginal occupancy.¹³⁴

SECTION 10. PROTECTION OF TRIBAL POSSESSION

Tribal possessory right may be defined as a power to command the aid of the law against trespassers, coupled with a privilege to use reasonable force in excluding such trespassers. An essential of possessory right, whether contained in statute, treaty, Executive order or judicial decision, is measurability. If both these elements are lacking, and imperfect if one is lacking.

The right to protection of tribal possession through an action of ejectment or other similar possessory action was affirmed at an early period. Thus, the Supreme Court in the case of Wahkiakum v. Banks,¹⁸⁰ declared:

This Indian title consisted of the usufruct and right of occupancy and enjoyment. . . . That an action of ejectment could be maintained on an Indian right to occupancy and use, is not open to question. This is the result of the decision in Johnson v. U'Etah, 8 Wheat 574, and was the question directly decided, in the case of Connel v. Ruffalo, 2 Yeager's Ten Rep 163, on the effect of trespass to individual Indians of a mile square each, ceded to the United States by the Cherokee treaties of 1817 and 1819. . . . (49 U.S. 232, 233)

This measure of communal law protection was amplified from time to time by treaty and statute provisions designed to prevent or punish various types of trespass upon Indian land. These provisions were usually limited either to a particular tribe or reservation or to a particular type of trespass, e.g., trespass for purposes of trading, driving livestock, stealing horses, and settlement. At no time has there been comprehensive legislation on the general problem of the protection of tribal property against trespass.¹⁸¹ The law on the subject is therefore a historical patchwork which can hardly be understood without reference to historical considerations.

A LEGISLATION ON TRESPASS

The early legislation, whether emanating from the United States,¹⁸² from the colonies,¹⁸³ or from the European powers,¹⁸⁴

¹⁸⁰ 9 How 228 (1830). A suit in trespass, brought by the individual occupant of tribal land against a non-Indian, was successfully maintained in Peltosa v. Blacksmith, 10 How 360 (1860).

In a case where a convicts under a congressional grant brought a successful suit in ejectment, a state court against the local Indian superintendent, the United States General held that the suit was founded on that judgment did not give the convicts legal possession of the land and that the plaintiff was an intruder who could be removed by federal authorities under R. S. 32118, and said:

. . . the tribe hold the reservation, not under the treaty, but under their original title, which is confirmed by the Government in agreement to the reservation. (See Gauvin v. Nokelson, 9 How 885.)

Thus it would seem that the title imparted by the acts of 1848 and 1858 was at that period, and has ever since continued to be, subject to the Indian right of occupancy in said tribe, the enjoyment of which right, moreover, is assured thereby by the Government by solemn treaty stipulations. . . . (P. 873)

New Pence Reservation—Claim of W. G. Langford, 14 Op. A. G. 508 (1875), decision reaffirmed in 17 Op. A. G. 808 (1882), and 20 Op. A. G. 42 (1891), the latter case holding that Langford held "nothing but a naked title" (p. 47, per Mr. Just. S. O.), which could not be invoked to prevent allotment. "What is the Indian right of occupancy? It is the right to enjoy the land forever with the right of alienation limited to one alienee, the United States, or to such persons as the United States, in its capacity of guardian over the Indians, may permit." (P. 48.)

imposed and to create new possessory rights, but to recognize existing rights inherent in the Indian nations. This recognition took the form of (a) declining the right or intention to interfere with the action of the Indian tribes, in their own territories, in excluding or removing intruders, or (b) establishing forms of civil or criminal proceedings in non-Indian courts against such intruders. Thus, we find in many of the early treaties, provisions recognizing the right of the Indian tribes to proceed against trespassers in accordance with their own laws and customs "which, at times, antedated the discovery of America by Europeans and applied, originally, only to intruders from other Indian tribes.

The historic source of tribal possessory right is a matter of note that antiquarian interest, since even today the limitations upon the right depend in part upon its source. Perhaps the clearest authoritative analysis of the basis and origin of tribal possessory right is that given in the case of Bute v. Wright.¹⁸⁵

The authority of the Creek Nation to prescribe the terms upon which noncitizens may transact business within its borders did not have its origin in act of Congress, treaty, or agreement of the United States. It was one of the inherent and essential attributes of its original sovereignty. It was a natural right of that people, indispensable to its autonomy as a distinct tribe or nation, and it must remain an attribute of its governmental authority by the acquiescence of the nation itself or by the superior power of the people if it is taken from it. Neither the authority nor the power of the United States to license its citizens to trade in the Creek Nation, with or without the consent of that tribe, is in issue in this case, because the complainants have no such license. The plenary power and lawful authority of the government of the United States, by treaty, by act of Congress or by the acquiescence of the government of the Creek Nation every vestige of its original or acquired governmental authority and power may be admitted, and for the purposes of this decision are here conceded. The fact remains nevertheless that every original attribute of the government of the Creek Nation still exists intact which has not been destroyed or limited by act of Congress, or by the contract of the Creek tribe itself. (17, 550)

The proposition that a tribe needs no grant of authority from the Federal Government in order to exercise its inherent power of excluding trespassers has been repeatedly affirmed by the Attorney General.¹⁸⁶ It is against the background of this recognition of tribal power that the course of federal legislation must be viewed. Thus viewed, legislative prohibitions against trespass on Indian land are seen as implementing the assumed international obligations of the United States.¹⁸⁷ committing injuries against Indians, (3) trespassers settling on Indian lands, (4) trespassers driving livestock upon Indian lands, and (5) trespassers hunting or trapping game on Indian lands.

Section 8 of the first Indian Intercourse Act,¹²² approved by President Washington on July 22, 1790, provided for the punishment of any person found in the Indian country "with such merchandise in his possession as are usually vendible to the Indians without a license first had and obtained," and this provision, with many modifications,¹²³ remains the law to this day. Section 8 of the same act¹²⁴ contained a further provision making it an offense for any inhabitant of the United States to "go into any town, settlement, or territory belonging to any nation or tribe of Indians and . . . there commit any crime upon, or trespass against the person or property of any peaceable and friendly Indian or Indians, which, if committed within the jurisdiction of any state, or within the jurisdiction of either of said districts, against a citizen or white inhabitant thereof, would be punishable by the laws of such state or district." This provision was likewise incorporated with minor modifications in subsequent statutes.¹²⁵

The first Indian Intercourse Act was temporary, to continue "in force for the term of two years, and from thence to the end of the next session of Congress, and no longer."¹²⁶

The second Intercourse Act, that of March 1, 1793,¹²⁷ introduced a new provision of importance. Section 5 of that act provided:

And be it further enacted, That if any such citizen or inhabitant shall make a settlement on lands belonging to any Indian tribe, or shall survey such lands, or designate their boundaries, by making trees, or other ways for the purpose of settlement, he shall forfeit a sum not exceeding one thousand dollars, not less than one hundred dollars and unless imprisonment not exceeding twelve months, in the discretion of the court, before whom the trial shall be. And if shall, moreover, be lawful for the President of the United States, to take such measures, as he may judge necessary, to remove from lands belonging to any Indian tribe, any citizens or inhabitants of the United States, who have made, or shall hereafter make, or attempt to make a settlement thereon. (P. 589)

The reference to "lands belonging to any Indian tribe" was amplified in later legislation to refer to "lands belonging, or seemed, or granted by treaty with the United States to any Indian tribe."¹²⁸ Various other minor modifications are found in the language of this provision, but in essence it sets forth the present-day law on the subject.

The second Indian Intercourse Act, like the first, was a temporary act, to continue "in force, for the term of two years, and from thence to the end of the then next session of Congress, and no longer."¹²⁹

The third Indian Intercourse Act, that of May 10, 1796,¹³⁰ dealt for the first time with two new kinds of trespasser, the hunter and the ranger. Section 2 of that act provided:

And be it further enacted, That if any citizen of, or other person resident in the United States, on either of the territorial districts, of the United States, shall cross over, or go within the said boundary line, to hunt, or in any wise destroy the game, or shall drive, or otherwise convey any stock of horses or cattle to range, on any lands allotted or secured by treaty with the United States, to any Indian tribe, he shall forfeit a sum not exceeding one hundred dollars, or be imprisoned not exceeding six months.

These provisions, reaffirmed and made permanent in the second version of the fifth Indian Intercourse Act,¹³¹ were subsequently separated and elaborated in the Act of June 30, 1834,¹³² which was a comprehensive statute on Indian relations.

Sec. 8. And be it further enacted, That if any person, other than an Indian, shall, within the limits of any tribe with whom the United States shall have existing treaties, hunt, or trap, or take and destroy, any peltries or game, except for subsistence in the Indian country, such person shall forfeit the sum of five hundred dollars, and forfeit all the traps, guns, and ammunition in his possession, used or procured to be used for that purpose, and peltries so taken. (P. 780)

Sec. 9. And be it further enacted, That if any person shall drive, or otherwise convey any stock of horses, mules, or cattle, to range and feed on any land belonging to any Indian or Indian tribe, without the consent of such tribe, such person shall forfeit the sum of one dollar for each animal of such stock. (P. 780)

The last of these provisions, which is still in force,¹³³ has been interpreted to cover only the case where cattle are "driven" to the reservation, or to the vicinity of the reservation.¹³⁴ It has been held that sheep are a "cattle" within the meaning of this section.¹³⁵

Following the 1834 act, Congress provided for the protection of Indian lands against trespass in various other statutes. Thus, the Act of July 20, 1837,¹³⁶ entitled "An Act to establish Peace with certain Hostile Indian Tribes" provided that "all the Indian tribes now occupying territory east of the Rocky mountains, not now peacefully residing on permanent reservations under treaty stipulations" should be offered reservations. lands' possessory right in such reservations was secured by the following statutory language:

"... Said district in districts, when so selected, and the selection approved by Congress, shall be and remain permanent homes for said Indians to be located thereon, and no person(s) and members of said tribes shall ever be permitted to enter therein without the permission of the tribes, not reserved, except officers and employees of the United States" (See 2.)

B. CONGRESSIONAL RESPECT FOR TRIBAL POSSESSION

In addition to the foregoing statutes prohibiting various forms of trespass upon Indian lands, there is a considerable body of legislation which extends recognition to tribal possession by exempting tribal lands from provisions designed to open up the public domain to settlement.¹⁰ Thus, for example, the Act of March 3, 1853,¹¹ relating to public lands in California, protects from settlement "any tract of land in the occupation of any Indian tribe."¹²

The Act of May 17, 1884,¹³ relating to Alaska contains a special proviso:

"Provided, That the Indians or other persons in said district shall not be disturbed in the possession of any lands actually in their use or occupation or now claimed by them, but the terms under which such persons may acquire title to said lands is reserved for future legislation by Congress." (P. 20.)

Protection of Indian possession is likewise the purpose of a provision in the Act of March 3, 1891,¹⁴ establishing a court of private land claims to determine land claims in former Mexican territory within New Mexico, Arizona, Utah, Nevada, Colorado, and Wyoming:

No claim shall be allowed that shall interfere with or overthrow any just and unquestioned Indian title in right to any land or place.

In the same spirit, grants of rights-of-way were frequently conditioned upon a special undertaking by the grantee that it

"... will neither aid, advise, nor assist in any effort looking towards the changing or extinguishing the present tenure of the Indians in their remaining lands, and will not attempt to secure from the Indian tribes any further grant of land or its occupancy than is hereinbefore provided. Provided, That any violation of the conditions mentioned in this section shall operate as a forfeiture of all the rights and privileges of said railway company under this act."¹⁵

In 1888 the Attorney General was able to say,¹⁶

"... it was and is a well-known policy of the Government not to sell lands until the Indian title of occupancy should be extinguished."

Even where Congress has not specifically provided for the protection of Indian possessory rights, the courts have read an implicit qualification into general legislation relating to the public domain, in order to protect such possession.

Thus, in the case of Spading v. Chaudler, the Supreme Court declared:¹⁷

"... The general grant of authority conferred upon the President by the act of March 1, 1857, c. 32, § 8 Stat. 16, to set apart certain portions of lands within the land district then created as were necessary for public uses, cannot be considered as empowering him to interfere with reservations existing by force of a treaty" (P. 405.)

Likewise, school land grants have never been made in disregard of tribal possessory rights.¹⁸ In the absence of an expressed intent of Congress to the contrary, railroad land grants have not affected tribal possessory rights.¹⁹ Even where Congress expressly stipulated to extinguish Indian title, railroad land grants conveyed only the unceded fee, subject to tribal occupancy and possessory rights.²⁰ Only where it was necessary to give migrants possessory rights to parts of the public domain, has Congress ever granted tribal lands in disregard of tribal possessory rights.²¹

C. WHO MAY PROTECT TRIBAL POSSESSION

The protection of tribal possessory rights has been recognized as a proper function of the Army,²² of the Interior Department,²³ and of the Department of Justice.²⁴ At the same time, the interest of the tribes themselves in self-protection has been recognized repeatedly in statutes.²⁵

Although primary concern for the protection of Indian lands against trespass rests with the Indian tribe and the Federal Government, it has been held that the individual states have a legitimate interest in protecting Indian possessions against trespass. Thus, it was early held by the Supreme Court that state laws protecting Indian lands against trespass were valid, and state decisions thereon entitled to great weight.²⁶ Where a state failed to hind included land reserved for Indians under state law, it was held that such patent was void as to the erroneously included Indian lands.¹⁴² The constitutionality of state legislation designed to protect Indian lands from trespass was upheld by the Supreme Court in State of New York v. Dibble.¹⁴³

And see Chapter 10, sec. 2A(1).

In that case the court declared, per Grier, J.

The statute in question is a police regulation for the protection of the Indians from intrusion of the white people, and to preserve the peace. . . . The power of a State to make such regulation to preserve the peace of the community is absolute, and has never been surrendered. (P. 370)

D. EFFECT OF TITLE UPON POSSESSORY RIGHT

The protection which the Federal Government gives to tribal possession is not limited to the cases where title to tribal land is held in the name of the United States, but extends equally to lands where ultimate title is vested in the state. An illuminating analysis of this problem is found in a memorandum to the Assistant Attorney General dated April 29, 1945, regarding the Onondaga Reservation.¹⁴⁴ Common authority is cited to show that even where the United States does not own the ultimate fee in the land of an Indian reservation, its relation of guardianship to the Indian tribe carries the power and duty of protecting the Indian possessory right against condemnation proceedings or other infringements by the state.

As guardian of the Indians there is imposed upon the Government a duty to protect these Indians in their property, it follows that this duty extends to protecting them against the unlawful acts of the State of New York. (P. 222.)¹⁴⁵

Likewise, it has been held that protection of tribal property by the Federal Government is not forewarn where a tribe occupies under state law and thus achieves corporate capacity.¹⁴⁶

E. AGAINST WHOM PROTECTION EXTENDS

Tribal possessory right in tribal land requires protection not only against private parties but against administrative officers acting without legal authority and against persons purporting to act with the permission of such officers. Thus where Indians were induced by administrative authorities to settle on a given area and the area was designated as the "Old Winnebago and Crow Creek Reservation" on Indian office maps, it was held that such lands were a "reservation" within the meaning of a subsequent treaty which set "reservation" lands apart "for the absolute and undisturbed use and occupation of the Indians herein named, and for such other friendly tribes or individual Indians as from time to time they may be willing, with the consent of the United States, to admit amongst them." . . .¹⁴⁷ It was further held that a later Executive order of February 27, 1885, opening these lands to entry was invalid and inoperative.¹⁴⁸

It was likewise ruled by the Attorney General that an application for permission to construct a ditch across an Executive order reservation, without the consent of the Indians, could not be legally granted by Interior Department officials, even though the ditch was supposed to be beneficial to the Indians. The Attorney General declared:

But the petitioners allege the reservation is not a legal one, and in consequence thereof the Indians for whom the reservation was made are only tenants at will of the Government. But the rights of tenants at will, so long as the landlord does not elect to determine the tenancy, are as sacred as those of a tenant in fee.¹⁴⁹

It has also been held¹⁵⁰ that the Federal Government is under an obligation to protect tribal lands even against fellow tribesmen.

The respect for tribal possessory rights shown by Congress and the courts has not always been shared by administrative authorities. In recent years, however, the Department of the Interior has slowly adhered to the view that a tribe may exclude from tribal property any nonmembers not specially authorized by law to enter thereon, that, having the right so to exclude outsiders, the tribe may condition the entry of such persons by requiring payments of fees, and that federal authorities, in the absence of specific legislative authorization, may not invade outsiders to enter upon tribal lands without tribal consent.

Indian possessory rights are enforceable against state authorities as well as against federal authorities.¹⁵¹ Thus, where a treaty between the United States and the Seneca Nation provided

The United States acknowledge all the land within the aforementioned boundaries (which include the reservations in question) to be the property of the Seneca nation, and the United States will never claim the same nor disturb the Seneca nation. . . . in the free use and enjoyment thereof, but it shall remain theirs until they choose to sell the same. . . . (Pp. 760-767)

the Supreme Court held that state taxation of tribal lands was inconsistent with the treaty and invalid.¹⁵² The court declared:

The tax titles purporting to convey these lands to the purchaser, even with the qualification suggested that the right of occupation is not to be affected, may well embarrass the occupants and be used by unworthy persons to the disturbance of the tribe. All agree that the Indian right of occupancy creates an indefeasible title to the reservations that may extend from generation to generation, and will cease only by the dissolution of the tribe, or their consent to sell to the party possessed of the right of pre-emption. He is the only party that is authorized to deal with the tribe in respect to their property, and thus with the consent of the government. Any other party is an intruder, and may be proceeded against as such under the twelfth section of the act of 30th June, 1834. . . . (P. 771.)

The question of how far Indian possessory rights are protected against Congress involves a problem of constitutional law considered earlier in Chapter 5.

With the establishment of the right of Indian tribes to the protection of federal and state governments (as well as self-protection) against trespass, whether by private parties or by state or federal officers, it becomes pertinent to consider the exact extent of the possessory right to which this protection attaches.

SECTION 11. EXTENT OF TRIBAL POSSESSORY RIGHTS

The extent of possessory right vested in an Indian tribe may differ in important respects from that of ordinary private possessory rights. Some of these differences run to the advantage of the Indian tribe, others, to its disadvantage.

Because an Indian tribe is a ward of the Government, it has been held that adverse possession under the statute of limitations does not run against an Indian tribe, even where title to the land is vested in the tribe and the tribe is incorporated under state law.¹²⁶ This rule was slightly modified by Congress, with respect to the Pueblos of New Mexico, in view of the fact that for many years these Pueblos had enjoyed the right to sue and be sued under territorial law.¹²⁷ The compromise adopted in the Public Lands Act of June 7, 1924,¹²⁸ was to the effect that adverse possession might be established by proof of (a) "open, notorious, actual, exclusive, continuous, adverse possession of the premises, claimed, under color of title from the 6th day of January, 1912, to the date of the passage of this Act" together with proof of tax payments, or (b) such possession "with claim of ownership, but without color of title from the 10th day of March, 1889."

While tribal lands are, like other lands, subject to the federal power of eminent domain,¹²⁹ they are not subject to the state power of eminent domain except where Congress has specifically so provided.¹³⁰ The constitutionality of congressional acts con-

fering upon state or private agencies the power to condemn tribal land is established beyond question.¹³¹

Tribal possessory rights may, as we have already noted, be expressly granted by the statute, treaty, or Executive order establishing the right, and in this way made subject, for instance, to entry under public land mineral laws.¹³²

Beyond for special limitations and special advantages of the type above noted, tribal possessory rights are equivalent in extent to the possession rights of private persons.¹³³

In determining the extent of Indian tribal lands, first importance naturally attaches to the treaty, statute, or other document upon which tribal ownership is predicated or by which it is defined. The fixing of boundaries of Indian reservations was a major part of early governmental policy in Indian affairs, as a means of securing peace between Indians and whites and among the Indian tribes themselves.¹³⁴ Both by treaty¹³⁵ and by statute¹³⁶ the United States has endeavored to settle conflicting claims and to resolve ambiguities in the definition of reservation boundaries.¹³⁷

Where the delimitation of tribal lands has proved to be of special difficulty, Congress has occasionally referred the determination of such boundaries to the Court of Claims,¹³⁸ or the Secretary of the Interior,¹³⁹ or has established a special tribunal to determine such questions.¹⁴⁰

In interpreting treaties and statutes defining Indian boundaries, the Supreme Court has said:

"... our effort must be to ascertain and execute the intention of the treaty makers, and as an element in the effort we have declared that construction must be made to the understanding of the Indians in redress of the differences in the power and intelligence of the contracting parties. United States v. Winick, 188 U. S. 871. The present case involves no special degree of the principle."

Apart from the foregoing principle, the same rules apply to the resolution of ambiguities in reservation boundaries as are applied to similar ambiguities in other deeds or patents.¹⁴¹

It is presumed that the bed of a navigable stream is not conveyed to an Indian tribe but is reserved by the United States for the future state to be established.¹⁴² However, an intent to confer ownership rights upon the Indian tribe in such stream bed may be shown by the context of the boundary description,¹⁴³ and such intent appears definitely where territory on both sides of the river is reserved to the Indian tribe. As was said in Donnelly v. United States:¹⁴⁴ "It would be absurd to treat the order as intended to include the uplands to the width of one mile to each side of the river, and at the same time to exclude the river" (at p. 260).¹⁴⁵ Tide lands and beds of navigable streams which have been made a part of an Indian reservation ¹³⁴ See Chapter 3, sec. 8A(2). The fixing of intertribal boundaries was the chief purpose of certain treaties, e.g., Treaty of August 19, 1856, with Chippewas et al., 7 Stat. 272, sec. 5 Op. A. G. 81 (1848).

¹³⁵ See Chapter 3, sec. 8A(2).

disputes have been invoked in reaching the determination that an island once part of an Indian reservation remains so although it becomes attached to the opposite bank of the river through a sudden change in the stream bed.⁴⁰

In other cases local state law has been invoked to settle ambiguities,⁴¹ and it has been held that where, under Minnesota law, the title of the Indian owner stops at the water's edge, the ownership by an Indian to the title of the entire shore line of a lake will not disturb state ownership of the lake bed.⁴²

SECTION 13. THE TEMPORAL EXTENT OF INDIAN TITLES

The question of when Indian possessory rights in a given tract of land come to an end, or, in technical terms, the question of the quantum of the tribal estate in land, has generally been raised in connection with such title as depends upon actual occupancy. The assumption that all possession of lands by Indian tribes is of an identical type has elsewhere been discussed and criticized and need not be reexamined at this point.⁴⁴

Within the diversity of tenures by which tribal lands are held, there undoubtedly exists a type of ownership that arises when the tribe becomes extinct or abandons the land. Although this circumstance is commonly cited as indicating a peculiar tenure by which Indian lands are held, an examination of the prevailing doctrines of real property law at the time when the theory of "Indian title" was first advanced, shows that there is nothing novel or peculiar about the legal justification or the practical significance of the doctrine. Under the feudal theory of English law, where the owner of land died without heirs or committed a felony, the land escheated to the Crown, or to the nearest lord. This right of escheat was not, strictly speaking, a form of inheritance but was a sovereign right superior to the property right of any landowner.⁴⁵ The right of escheat became less valuable, with respect to individual landowners, when the salutary right of testamentary disposition was extended to real property. An Indian tribe, however, could not, under British or American law, alienate its land without the consent of the Crown or the Federal Government. Therefore, the possibility that land would be left vacant when a tribe disappeared or abandoned the land was a real possibility and the rule of escheat served the same purpose that it served under early feudal conditions in England. Land held by a tribe in fee simple would be subject to escheat and it is unnecessary to assume any peculiarty of "Indian title" to explain this result.

Although technically the right of escheat was something entirely distinct from a possibility of reverter, there is ample precedent for confusing the two institutions.⁴⁶ Thus, although one might say with perfect accuracy that land held by an Indian tribe in fee simple would escheat to the United States when the tribe became extinct or abandoned the property, it became fashionable to refer to this incident as a possibility of reverter, rather than escheat. This use of language was not restricted to Indian tribes, but was applied, in the early nineteenth century, to all corporations under the doctrine that a corporation had "only a determinable fee for the purposes of enjoyment. On the dissolution of the corporation, the reverter is to the original grantor or his heirs."⁴⁷ It was generally agreed that "corporations have a fee simple for the purpose of alienation,"⁴⁸ but this portion of the doctrine was, of course, inapplicable to Indian tribes.

If these observations are well taken, we should conclude that it makes little practical difference whether we describe an Indian estate as a fee simple absolute subject to the ordinary sovereign right of escheat, or call the Indians' estate a determinable fee with a possibility of reverter in the sovereign, or refer to "Indian title of use and occupancy."

The only point at which these various theories may perhaps diverge lies in the test to be applied to determine when land has been "abandoned."

In *Holden v. Joy*⁴⁹ the Indian estate in question was to be, according to the governing treaty, a fee simple, but the patent issued by the President included the condition "that the lands hereby granted shall revert to the United States, if the said Choctees become extinct, or abandon the same."⁵⁰ The Supreme Court rejected the argument that such abandonment took place by reason of (a) Choctee participation in the Civil War on the part of the Confederacy, or (b) an agreement whereby the Choctees allowed Congress to sell the land for their benefit. The Court held that the Choctee title continued until, by the agreement in question, title became vested in the United States. The Court further declined

Beyond doubt the Choctees were the owners and occupants of the territory where they resided before the first approach of civilized man to the western continent, deriving their title, as they claimed, from the Great Spirit, to whom the whole earth belongs, and they were unquestionably the sole and exclusive masters of the territory, and claimed the right to govern themselves by their own laws, usages, and customs.

Enough has already been remarked to show that the lands conveyed to the United States by the treaty were held by the Choctees under their original title, acquired by immemorial possession, commencing ages before the New World was known to civilized man. Unmistakably their title was absolute, subject only to the pre-emption right of purchase acquired by the United States as the successors of Great Britain, and the right also on their part as such successors of the discovery to prohibit the sale of the land to any other governments or their subjects, and to exclude all other governments from any interference in their affairs. (Pp. 214-211)

Again, the Supreme Court held in Acute Indians v. United States,²¹ that delay in the settlement of new lands did not constitute abandonment.²² On the other hand, the Supreme Court, holding that the Pawnee Indians did not own a large part of the city of Chicago, indicated as one basis for its decision the fact that the Pawnee Indians had, after conveying at least all the lands above the lake level, abandoned the district for more than half a century.²³ It appears to be settled law that actual removal of an entire tribe from one reservation to another, where such removal is voluntary, constitutes abandonment.²⁴

Although various tests may be found asserting that the title of Indian tribes is less, in point of temporal extent, than a fee simple, reliance upon such tests has proven extremely hazardous.²⁵ A realistic analysis of the cases suggests that the only clear distinction between "Indian title" and "fee simple title" lies in the fact that title in lands are subject to statutory restrictions upon alienation.²⁶

SECTION 14. SUBSURFACE RIGHTS

Whether the possessory right of an Indian tribe includes minerals depends, as does every other question relating to the extent of Indian possessory rights, upon the treaty, statute, Executive order or other document in issue of which upon which the right is based. Where a treaty, statute, or Executive order specifically provides that minerals on Indian land shall be reserved to the United States,²⁷ or where a statute specifies that title to land purchased from an Indian tribe shall not extend to mineral rights,²⁸ no question is likely to arise. So too, a treaty or statute may provide that the Indian tribe shall have specified rights of mining or quarrying in land belonging to the United States.²⁹

Questions as to the Indian right to minerals have generally arisen where nothing specific appears in the treaty, statute, or other document upon which the Indian claim is based, or where the Indian claim is based simply on aboriginal occupancy. Confirmation of the view that aboriginal occupancy may include subsurface rights as well as surface rights is found in the case of Chouteau v. Johnson.³⁰ A treaty provision by which designated lands were "set apart for the absolute and undisturbed use and occupation of the Shoshone Indians" was held to convey to the Indians title mineral, as well as timber, rights, in the case of United States v. Shoshone Tribe.³¹

Further analysis of the extent of Indian mineral rights is found in the opinion³² of Attorney General (afterwards Justice)

Stone rendered on May 27, 1924, with reference to the proposal of Secretary of the Interior Fall to open Executive order reservation lands to mineral entry under the laws governing minerals within the public domain. After analyzing the terms of the general mining laws, the Attorney General decided:

The general mining laws never applied to Indian reservations, whether created by treaty act, Congress, or executive order. Quinn v. Caterdon Mining Co., 121 U. S. 381; Kendall v. San Juan Mining Co., 144 U. S. 678; Wadden v. Mountain View M. & M. Co., 87 Fed. 670; Gibson v. Anderson, 181 Fed. 99.

In support of this conclusion based upon the language of the general mining laws, the Attorney General presented an analysis of Indian mineral rights which may well be set forth in full, without comment, as a complete exposition of the subject:

If the extent of the Indian rights depended merely on donations, or on deductions to be drawn from descriptive terms, there might be some question whether the right of "occupancy and use" included any right to the hidden or latent resources of the land, such as minerals or potential water power, of which the Indians in their original state had no knowledge. As a practical matter, however, their question has been resolved in favor of the Indians by a uniform series of legislative and treaty provisions beginning many years ago and extending to the present time. Thus the treaty provisions for the allotment of reservation lands all contemplate the final passing of a perfect fee title to the individuals of the tribe. And that meant, of course, that minerals and all other hidden or latent resources would go with the fee. The same is true of the General Allotment Act of 1887, which implies expressly to executive order reservations as well as to others. Then, beginning years ago, many special acts were passed (with or without previous agreements with the Indians concerned) whereby surplus lands remaining to the tribe after completion of the allotments were to be sold for their benefit. In all these instances Congress has recognized the right of the Indians to receive the full sales value of the land, including the value of the timber, the minerals, and all other elements of value, less only the expenses of the Government in surveying and selling the land. Legislation and treaties of this character were dealt with in Frost v. Waine, 157 U. S. 46, 80; Minnesota v. Hitchcock, 185 U. S. 373; Lone Wolf v. Hitchcock, 187 U. S. 556; United States v. Browder, 128 Fed. 910, 913; and Shree Co. v. United States, 282 U. S. 159.

Similar provisions have been made in many other cases for the sale of surplus tribal lands, all the proceeds of all elements of value to go to the tribe. In a recent act for further allotment of Crow Indian lands (41 Stat. 761), the minerals are reserved to the tribe instead of passing to the allottees (Sec. 8), and moreover, unallotted lands chiefly valuable for the development of water power are

The suit was brought under sec. 22 of the Act of April 4, 1910, 36 Stat. 260, 264, on the basis of the Treaty of April 19, 1868, 11 Stat. 741. The decision was reversed on other grounds in 272 U. the treaty or statute establishing the reservation has referred to "Indian use and occupancy" or used some similar phrase. These questions were obviously complicated by the interpretations placed on language of the Supreme Court in the cases of *United States v. Cook*³¹ and Pine River Logging Co. v. United States.³²

In the former of these cases, timber standing on tribal land was cut by individual Indians, without the authority of the Interior Department.³³ The United States brought an action of replevin against the vendor, and the Supreme Court held that the United States was entitled to recover possession of the timber. The Court based its decision upon the argument that since the timber while standing is a part of the realty, standing timber cannot be sold by the Indians, and only timber rightfully severed from the soil can be legally sold.³⁴ Whether timber was rightfully severed depended upon whether its cutting resulted in improvement of the land or on the contrary, amount of waste. Since the facts of the case established the latter situation, the Court held that the possession of the vendor was illegal. The Court did not decide whether, in recovering the timber or its value, the United States was to hold such timber or timber in trust for the Indian tribe concerned, or whether such recovery was to accrue to the general funds of the United States Treasury.

In the course of its opinion, the Supreme Court, per White, C. J., declared:

These are familiar principles in this country and well settled, as applicable to tenants for life and remaindermen. But a tenant for life has all the rights of occupancy in the lands of a remainderman. The Indians have the same rights in the lands of their reservation. What a tenant for life may do upon the lands of a remainderman the Indians may do upon their reservations, but no more. (P. 304.)

The view thus expressed was confirmed by the Supreme Court in the Pine River Logging Co. case,³⁵ where an action in the nature of trover, brought by the United States against the vendors of unlawfully cut timber, was upheld by the Court. In the course of its opinion, the Court, per Brown, J., declared:

The argument overlooks the fact that the Indians had no right to the timber upon this land other than to provide themselves with the necessary wood for their individual use, or to improve their land. United States v. Cook, 10 Wall. 593, except so far as Congress chose to extend such right; that they had no right even to contract for the cutting of dead and down timber, unless such contracts were approved by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs; that the Indians in fact were not treated as aut jure, but every movement made by them, either in the execution or the performance of the contract, was subject to government supervision for the express purpose of averting the latter against the abuse of the right given by the statute. (P. 206.)

In the Pine River Logging Co. case (and probably in the Cook case) the Department of the Interior and the Department of Justice apparently construed the decision as implying that the title concerned had no property interest in the timber or in the land recovered. In an opinion rendered in 1888, the Attorney General answered in the negative the following question presented by the Secretary of the Interior:³⁶

(1) Whether the Indians occupying reservations, the title to which is in the United States, have the right, in view of the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of the United States v. George Cook (10 Wall. 593), to cut and sell for their use and benefit the dead and down timber which is found to a greater or less extent on many of the reservations and which will go to waste if not used? (19-104-105.)

Two years later the Attorney General ruled that where timber on land of the Flathead and Lac tribe was cut by trespassers, with the connivance of Indian Service officials, the timber should be sold by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, the proceeds to "belong to the Government absolutely."³⁷

This view was supported by the argument that, under the Cook case, the Indians have "the mere right to use and enjoy the land as occupants" and that, therefore, "the Indians have no interest in this timber." The Board of Indian Commissioners had protested immediately after the decision in the Cook case, against an interpretation of that case which would "prevent the Indians from cutting and marketing their timber," alleging that such a construction, particularly when applied to dead and down timber, "would prove not only a loss to the Indians, but an absolute damage to the United States."³⁸ In 1889 Congress enacted a statute authorizing the sale of dead timber on Indian reservations by the Indians of the reservation, under Presidential regulations,³⁹ thus recognizing an Indian possessory right but leaving its extent still uncertain.

In a later opinion of the Attorney General, it was held that the Indian occupants of an Executive order reservation were entitled to the proceeds of timber sales.⁴⁰

In the case of the Rhodesian Indians v. United States,⁴¹ the Court of Claims pointed out that the interpretation of the Cook case denying the validity of the Indian interest in timber was unnecessary and unprofitable. In the Cook case, it was pointed out, "The court decided that the members of the Oneida Tribe had no right to cut the timber on the land solely for the purpose of sale, that to do so was waste as in the case of the cutting of timber by a trespasser; and that the United States is the owner of the fee because the owner of the logs." The court further declared:

In that case two points were decided. First, it was decided by analogy to the law relating to the respective rights of life-tenant and remainderman, that the Indians have no right to cut the timber on an Indian reservation for the purpose of sale only, that to do so is waste, and that the

³⁵ It is alleged that the value of the land, exclusive of the timber, is no more than $1,000. After the thousand dollar worth of timber has been cut from the land. The resultant upon alienation would be reduced to small consequence if it be confined to one-third of the value of the land and afterwards the title left to the untrained or unqualified disposition of the Indian. Such is not the legal effect of the patent. (P. 381.)

* * * while, perhaps, there may be some question whether the Indians would have the right to commit waste, properly so called, upon the land, or to use the timber for the purpose of speculation, still there can be no doubt they would have the right to clear the land for cultivation; and, if so, it would seem, to sell the wood thus obtained from the land; and to say that they could have the right to cut and use the wood and timber for those purposes, and that they could not sell it to enable them to obtain necessary articles, such as nails and other materials for the construction of their buildings and fences, would seem to be making a very refined distinction and one not warranted under the circumstances of the case.

title to timber so cut vests in the United States as the owner of the fee of "timber land." Second, the Indians have an exclusive right of use and occupancy of unpatented timber, and the right to cut the standing timber during the whole period of such occupancy is not only for use upon the premises, but "for the purpose of improving the land or the better adapting it to convenient occupation of the right to sell all timber cut for the latter purpose." It is clear therefore that this decision did not hold that the government had the right to cut and dispose of the timber on Indian Reservations, or to sell Indian lands for its own use and benefit without accounting therefor to the Indian tribe. When a reservation is definitely set apart for an Indian tribe by treaty or statute, the Government has only the right and power to control and manage the property and affairs of the Indians in good faith for their betterment, but, as stated by the court in Shoshone Tribe of Indians v. United States, 290 U. S. 470:

Power to control and manage the property and affairs of Indians in good faith for their betterment and welfare may be exerted in many ways and at times even in deprivation of the persons of a treaty. Lucas v. Hay's Hitchcock, 187 U. S. 261, 364, 395, 398. The power does not extend so far as to enable the Government "to give the tribal lands to others, or to appropriate them to its own purposes, without rendering or assuming an obligation to render, just compensation" for that which would be an exercise of guardianship, but an act of confiscation. United States v. Cook, supra, p. 110, 113. ***

Government counsel argue here that United States v. Cook, supra, decided that the interest of the Indians in the reservation lands, and timber thereon is that of a life tenant and no more. In that case the court did say that "What a tenant for life may do upon the lands, or a tenant-at-will the Indians may do upon their reservations, but no more." But in this comparing the position of the Indians with that of a life-tenant for the purpose of stating what the Indians may or may not do on their reservations, we think the court did not intend definitely to hold that the interest of the Indians in the lands of their reservations is similar to that of a tenant for life. Such a holding would have been in conflict with the statement of the court after reviewing prior cases concerning the nature of Indian title, that the Indians have the right of use and occupancy of unpatented timber. We think also that the contention of counsel for defendant is inconsistent with the holding of the Supreme Court in the case at bar—that the power of the government to control and manage the property and affairs of the Indians in good faith for their betterment and welfare does not extend so far as to enable the government to give the land to others or to appropriate them to its own purposes. (Pp. 364-365.)

The decision of the Court of Claims, that the value of Shoshone lands taken by the Government must include the value of the timber thereon, was upheld by the Supreme Court on appeal,¹⁰⁰ and confirmed in the later case of United States v. Klamath Indians.¹⁰¹ Following this decision, Congress by special statute directed the Secretary of the Treasury to credit to the tribal funds of the Chippewa Indians the amount of the judgment in the Pine River Logging Co. case, which had been erroneously deposited in the Treasury of the United States as public moneys, together with interest thereon.¹⁰²

It must, therefore be taken as settled law at the present time, that in the absence of specific language to the contrary the establishment of an Indian reservation for the use and occupancy of the Indians, confers to the Indians an interest in the timber of the reservation as complete as is the tribal interest in the land itself, that the cutting and alienation of such timber is subject to congressional legislation, and that the wrongful acts of individual Indians, vendors of timber or agents of the United States Government cannot deprive an Indian tribe of its interest in tribal timber, or of its right to receive the proceeds of timber cut and alienated without the consent of the tribe.

These views are supported by the course of congressional legislation relating to timber growing on tribal land. Congress has repeatedly enacted special legislation authorizing disposition of timber on various designated reservations providing always that the proceeds of such disposition should accrue to the benefit of the tribe concerned.¹⁰³

Apart from these special statutes Congress has enacted various laws of general application relating to the disposition of tribal timber, and providing that proceeds therefrom shall accrue to the benefit of the tribe concerned. Thus, section 7 of the Act of June 25, 1910,¹⁰⁴ reads:

That the timber living and dead and down timber on unallotted lands of any Indian reservation may be sold under regulations to be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, and the proceeds from such sales shall be used for the benefit of the Indians of the reservation in such manner as he may direct. Provided, That this section shall not apply to the States of Minnesota and Wisconsin. (P. 867.)

Again Congress, by the Act of July 3, 1926,¹⁰⁵ provided that the net proceeds derived from the sale of timber on Indian lands should be credited to the funds of the tribe.

Similarly, various treaties have recognized the Indian right in timber on tribal land by providing for payments to the Indian tribe when such timber was destroyed without tribal consent.¹⁰⁶ Many other treaties provide for the establishment of Indian nurseries, and these have been construed as evidencing an understanding that the Indians would own the timber on the reservation.¹⁰⁷

Further recognition of the two-way interest of an Indian tribe in the timber growing upon its land is found in statutory provisions reserving timber on allotted land for the benefit of the tribe,¹⁰⁸ or reserving tribal timberlands from sale, where other lands are offered for sale.¹⁰⁹

The action of Congress in exercising a large measure of supervision, through the Department of the Interior, over the disposition of Indian timber in no more a denial of the Indian ¹⁰⁰ 304 U. S. 111 (1938). Commenting on the Cook case, the Supreme Court declared, per Butler, J. (Read, J. dissenting):

United States v. Cook, supra, gives no support to the contention that in ascertaining the compensation to be paid to the Indians, the value of mineral and timber resources in the reservation should be excluded. That case did not involve adjudication of the scope of Indian title to land, mineral or standing timber, but only the right of the United States to replevin logs cut and sold by a few unauthorized members of the tribe. We held that, as against the purchaser from the wrongdoers, the United States' title's right of occupancy in property was not include ownership of the land or mineral deposits or standing timber upon the reservation, or that the tribe's title was the more equivalent, or, like, the title of a life tenant. (P. 118.)

The argument contra is presented in a Memorandum of the Asst. Attorney General, dated December 10, 1937, 1-2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7, 8, 9, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 17, 18, 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, 24, 25, 26, 27, 28, 29, 30, 31, 32, 33, 34, 35, 36, 37, 38, 39, 40, 41, 42, 43, 44, 45, 46, 47, 48, 49, 50, 51, 52, 53, 54, 55, 56, 57, 58, 59, 60, 61, 62, 63, 64, 65, 66, 67, 68, 69, 70, 71, 72, 73, 74, 75, 76, 77, 78, 79, 80, 81, 82, 83, 84, 85, 86, 87, 88, 89, 90, 91, 92, 93, 94, 95, 96, 97, 98, 99, 100.

In this case the Court ruled: The claims declared that the district retained should, until otherwise directed by the President, be set apart as a reservation for the Indians and that the proceeds of the timber sales should be clearly not be deducted from the tribe's right of occupancy. That would be attributable to the timber was a part of the value of the land upon which it grew. (P. 126.)

interest in such timber than in the equally large measure of control over allocation of Indian lands; a denial of the Indian interest in such lands. On the contrary, the underlying purpose of such legislation, for many years, has been the protection of the interests of the tribe as a whole against overaggressive individual and generations needlessness of posterity.¹ It is believed that the first federal law establishing the principle of sustained yield timber production was the Act of March 28 1890,² relating to timber cutting on the Metometome Reservation.

Federal control over the disposition of tribal timber applies even where the tribe concerned holds the land in fee simple,³ which is a clear indication that limitations upon the disposition of Indian tribal timber are in no way inconsistent with a recognition that the full benefit of interest therein is vested in the Indian tribe.

The tribal possessory right in timber may be protected both by civil and by criminal proceedings. Actions in the nature of replevin,⁴ or trespass,⁵ or injunction⁶ suits have been brought in the United States, as already noted, where timber has been disposed of unlawfully. In addition, criminal sanctions have been applied.

Section 5589 of the Revised Statutes, making it an offense to cut timber on lands of the United States reserved for military or other purposes, was apparently the only statute on the books that might be construed to make unlawful cutting of Indian tribal timber⁷ a criminal offense, until June 4, 1888 when an amend-

The preservation of Indian timber lands on a perpetually productive basis by including selective protection, preventing their cutting in clear cuttings areas, and making adequate provision for new forest growth while the mature timber is increasing.

Regulation 6 provides for sale of timber only where the volume produced by the forest annually is in excess of that which is profitable at development by the Indians, or where the stand is rapidly deteriorating for various reasons, and then only after the timber to be sold has been inspected and the contract of sale approved.

ment to this section was adopted which added to the section the words "on upon any Indian reservation, or lands belonging to or occupied by any tribe of Indians under authority of the United States."⁸ In 1900, this statute was incorporated, with slight verbal changes, in the Penal Code,⁹ as section 36. The provision in question, as subsequently amended, reads:¹⁰

§ 36. Whoever shall unlawfully cut, or aid in unlawfully cutting, or shall wantonly injure or destroy, or attempt to be wantonly injured or destroyed, any tree, growing, standing, or being upon any land of the United States which, in pursuance of law, has been reserved or purchased by the United States for any public use, or upon any Indian reservation or lands belonging to or occupied by any tribe of Indians under the authority of the United States, or any Indian allotment while the title to the same shall be held in trust by the Government, or while the same shall remain inalienable by the allottee without the consent of the United States, shall be fined not more than five hundred dollars, or imprisoned not more than one year, or both.¹¹

The validity of federal penal legislation in this field appears to be beyond question,¹² and its applicability to individual members of the tribe that owns the timber has been maintained even in an extreme case where the court was forced to say:

It is plain that by cutting trees on the reservation Knapik brought himself within the letter of the section as amended. He did not, however, cut the trees for sale or profit. To occupy and cultivate the tract allotted to him in severalty he needed a house and barn, and the trees were cut for the sole purpose of erecting such buildings upon his premises. It seems harsh to visit upon him the penalty of the statute for this act, but the court must administer the law as it finds it.¹³

SECTION 16. TRIBAL WATER RIGHTS

Whether water rights inure to a tribe and to what extent is largely a matter of judicial interpretation. The early treaties with the Indians seldom mentioned and never defined water rights. And yet, since the Indian economy was built at that time in part on fishing and later on agriculture, it was essential that a tribe be assured some right to the water within or bordering the reservation.

That the Federal Government had the power to reserve the waters flowing through the territories and except them from appropriation under the state laws had early been decided.¹⁴ Thus, when the question of tribal water right first arose the Supreme Court in the case of *Winters v. United States*¹⁵ held that where land in territorial status was reserved by treaty to an Indian tribe, there was implicitly reserved for the Indians, and withheld from subsequent appropriation by others, water of the streams of the reservations necessary for the irrigation of their lands.

The reservation was a part of a very much larger tract which the Indians had the right to occupy and use and which was adequate for the habits and wants of a nomadic and uncivilized people. It was the policy of the Government, it was the desire of the Indians, to chain those lands, and to leave one a pastoral and civilized people.¹⁴ If they should become such the original tract was too extensive, but a smaller tract would be made quite without a change of conditions. The lands were not and, without irrigation, were practically useless. And yet it is contended the means of irrigation were deliberately given up by the Indians and deliberately accepted by the Government. (P. 701.)

This contention, the Court said, could not be accepted, especially in view of the rule that agreements with Indians are to be construed in favor of the Indians. The Court rejected also the further contention that the United States had repealed the reservation of water for the Indians by the admission into the Union of Montana, the State in which the reservation was situated. It would be extreme to believe the Court said, that Congress—

... took from them the means of continuing their old habit, yet did not leave them the power to change to new ones. (P. 577.)

The Winters decision effects a prohibition against the diversion of water from a stream above and outside the reservation mouth, as such diversion deprives the tribe of water necessary for the irrigation of tribal lands. In other words, these reserved rights are the property of the Indians to be protected by the Federal Government and no appropriation of water either under state or federal laws which reduces the amount of water in a stream within an Indian reservation below the amount necessary for irrigation of Indian lands is valid.

The Winters decision was thus followed in Omaha Irr. Co. v. United States.¹⁵

... This court affirmed the decree in the Winters case, holding that the United States, by treaties with the Indians on the reservation, had implicitly reserved the waters of Milk river to the benefit of the Indians on the reservation to the extent reasonably necessary to enable them to irrigate their lands, and that grantees and settlers on public lands outside of their reservation could not acquire, under the desert land laws of the United States or the laws of the state of Montana relating to the appropriation of the waters of the streams of that state, the right to divert the waters of Milk river to the prejudice of the rights of the Indians existing upon that reservation. ... The law of that case is applicable to the present case, and determines the paramount right of the Indians of the Blackfoot Indian reservation to the use of the waters of Birch creek to the extent reasonably necessary for the purposes of irrigation and stock raising, and domestic and other useful purposes. The government has undertaken, by agreement with the Indians on these reservations, to promote their improvement, comfort, and welfare by aiding them to become self-sustaining as a peaceable and agricultural people. The lands within these reservations are dry and arid and require the diversion of waters from the streams to make them productive and suitable for agricultural, stock-raising, and domestic purposes.

The doctrine enunciated in the Winters case as applied to reservations created by treaty was later recognized by the courts as applicable to reservations created by Executive order. In United States v. Walker River Irrigation District,¹⁶ the Circuit Court of Appeals had this to say

... The trial court thought Winters v. United States distinguishable, as being based on an agreement on treaty with the Indians. Here there was no treaty. It said that at the time the Walker River reservation was set apart, the Paiutes were at war with the whites, hence no agreement between them and the Government was possible.

As to the Winters case, as in this the basic question for determination was one of intent—whether the waters of the stream were intended to be reserved for the use of the Indians, or whether the lands only were reserved. We see no reason to believe that the intention to reserve need be evidenced by treaty or agreement. A claim on an executive order setting apart the reservation may be equally indicative of the intent. While in the Winters case the court emphasized the treaty, there was in fact no express reservation of water to be found in that document. The intent or had to be arrived at by taking account of the circumstances, the situation and needs of the Indians and the purpose for which the lands had been reserved. (P. 730.)

The views expressed in the foregoing cases are supported by the course of congressional legislation relating to tribal rights in water. Congress has repeatedly enacted special legislation authorizing the construction of irrigation projects on various designated reservations, providing always that the Indians shall be supplied with water from the project.¹⁷

Again, in opening reservation land to mineral entry Congress has expressly excepted "lands containing springs, water holes, or other bodies of water needed or used by the Indians for watering livestock, irrigation, or water-power purposes."¹⁸ By the Act of March 7, 1928,¹⁹ Congress provided for the purchase of land with sufficient water right for the use and occupancy of the Tonto Band of Homeless Indians. When the Yakima Reservation was receiving less water than the amount to which it was entitled under the doctrine of the Winters case, Congress appropriated a sum of money for the purchase of an additional water right for the Indians.²⁰ To protect the water rights of the Indians of the Toos Pueblo, Congress has authorized the President to withdraw from entry lands within the watershed and to protect said lands from any act or condition which would impair the purity or the volume of the water flowing therefrom.²¹ Water from streams on the ceded portion of the Fort Hall Reservation necessary for irrigation of land under cultivation has been reserved to the Indians inasmuch as long as the Indians "remain where they now live."²²

Similarly, various statutes have provided for payment of compensation to be credited to tribal funds in the event Indian water rights are sold, appropriated or otherwise damaged.²³

Apart from the foregoing statutes Congress has enacted various laws of general application relating to the water rights of Indian allottees.²⁴

A. TRIBAL RIGHT versus STATE RIGHT IN NAVIGABLE WATERS

The ownership by the United States of lands in territorial status extends to the lands underlying all bodies of water therein.¹⁰⁰ Where unreserved, the title to land underlying navigable waters is held in trust to a state upon admission into the Union, while title to the land underlying non-navigable waters remains in the United States.¹⁰¹

If navigable waters have not been reserved the tribe has but a right of use in common with citizens of the state.¹⁰² It becomes pertinent therefore to examine the criteria for determining whether such waters have been reserved to a tribe. Here again questions of intent and of circumstances surrounding the creation of the reservation are of paramount importance. Thus, in holding that the lands underlying the navigable waters within the Red Lake Indian Reservation passed to the State of Minnesota upon its admission into the Union, the Supreme Court said:¹⁰³

"We come then to the question whether the lands under the lake were disposed of by the United States before Minnesota became a State. An affirmative disposal is not reserved, but only that the lake and therefore the lands under it, was within the limits of the Red Lake Reservation when the State was admitted. The existence of the reservation is conceded, but that it operated as a disposal of lands underlying navigable waters within its limits is disputed. We are of opinion that the reservation was not intended to effect such a disposal and that there was none. If the reservation operated as a disposal of the lands under a part of the navigable waters within its limits it equally worked a disposal of the lands under all. Besides Aked Lake, the reservation lands included Red Lake, having an area of 400 square miles, the greater part of the Lake of the Woods, having approximately the same area, and several navigable streams. The reservation came into being through a succession of treaties with the Chippewas whereby they ceded to the United States their aboriginal right of occupancy to the surrounding lands. The last treaties, preceding the admission of the State were concluded September 20, 1854, 10 Stat. 1160, and February 22, 1855, 10 Stat. 1165. There was no formal cession apart of what was not ceded, nor an affirmative declaration of the rights of the Indians thereto, nor any attempted exclusion of others from the use of navigable waters. The effect of what was done was to reserve in a general way for the continued occupancy of the Indians what remained of their aboriginal territory, and thus to come to be known and regarded as a reservation. Minnesota v. Illinois, 135 U.S. 373, 389. There was nothing in this which even approached a grant of rights in lands underlying navigable waters, nor anything even done for a purpose to depart from the established policy before stated, of treating such lands as held for the benefit of the future State. Without doubt the Indians were to have access to the navigable waters and to be entitled to use them in accustomed ways; but these were common rights vested in all, whether white or Indian, by the only legislation involved in Redford Co. v. Schenck, 7 Wall. 272, 287-288, and Beconomy Light & Power Co. v. United States, supra, pp. 118-120, and emphasized in the Enabling Act under which Minnesota was admitted as a State, c. 93, 11 Stat. 363, which declared that the rivers and waters bounding the State and the navigable waters flowing into the same shall be common highways, and forever free, as well to the inhabitants of said State as to all other citizens of the United States." 11p. 377-378.)

A similar result was reached in Tucker v. United States,¹⁰⁴ on the theory that since the Executive order creating the Quileute Indian Reservation made no express reference to the Quileute River as the northern boundary, no reservation of its waters was intended, nor any exception to the general policy of the Government to hold such property in trust for the future states.

Where a reservation is created after admission of a state into the Union, there is some question as to whether the unappropriated navigable waters within the reservation are reserved to the tribe. An affirmative answer would seem to deprive the State of an acquired right unless it can be said that the creation of the reservation serves as a notice of the appropriation of unappropriated navigable waters within its border for the use of the Indians.

Where California by statute classified a river as nonnavigable, it has been held that by the subsequent creation of a reservation the waters therein were reserved for the benefit of the Indians.¹⁰⁵

B. EXTENT OF RESERVED WATER RIGHT

It will be remembered that the Court in the Winters case decreed only that there was an implied reservation to a tribe of an amount of water reasonably necessary for irrigation and domestic purposes. There was left open the further question of whether the water right impliedly reserved for use for irrigation includes a flow of water sufficient merely to supply the needs of the Indians at the time of the creation of the reservation, or whether it includes a flow sufficient in quantity to irrigate all the irrigable lands of the reservation.

The policy which underlies the doctrine of implied reservation of water has been given effect by holdings that when an Indian reservation is set apart, the water right impliedly reserved is large enough to irrigate the entire irrigable acreage of the reservation.¹⁰⁶ In Conrad Fur Co. v. United States,¹⁰⁷ the court granted a right to a designated amount of water with leave to the Government to apply for modification of the decree at any time it might determine that its needs would be in excess of that amount. The District Court decision¹⁰⁸ shows clearly that the water right reserved was based on total irrigable acreage (p. 130) and increased need was anticipated only because of probable change in use of the land resulting from the Indians' progress in agriculture (p. 129). Likewise, in Karem v. United States,¹⁰⁹ where water was expressly reserved by treaty for irrigation "on land actually cultivated and in use," the court held that the water right reserved was not limited in quantity to the amount of water necessary to the irrigation of such portion of the Indian lands as were at the time of the treaty actually irrigated. The court said (p. 95):

"The purpose of the agreement was to induce the Indians to relinquish their nomadic habits and to till the soil, and the treaties should be construed in the light of that purpose and such meaning should be given them as will enable the Indians to cultivate eventually the whole of their lands so reserved to their use.

The decision of the Circuit Court of Appeals in the case of *United States v. Walker River Irrigation District*¹¹ would seem to control the foregoing decisions. The court there held, in accordance with the Waters decision, that by the establishment of the Walker River Reservation in 1850 there was implicitly reserved water to the extent reasonably necessary to supply the needs of the Indians. However, in determining the quantity of water "to which the United States is entitled" the court held:

The area of irrigable land included in the reservation is not necessarily the criterion for measuring the amount of water reserved; whether the standard be applied as of 1850 or as of the present. The extent to which the use of the stream might be necessary could only be demonstrated by experience. (C 340.)

The court found from the record that about 1,900 acres were under cultivation as early as 1880, that this area had not been substantially increased up to the time of trial, and that the number of Indians on the reservation was not increasing. Adverting to the master's finding that a demand for the cultivation of more than 2,100 acres, or a water right of 20,237 cubic feet per second had not been shown, the court concluded:

We are constrained to accept this estimate as a fair measure of the needs of the Government as demonstrated by seventy years' experience. (C 340.)

While lands were reserved in tribal status questions of water right were confined largely to whether particular waters had been reserved to the tribe. With the question of the placing of obstructions to tribal lands to subdivided lands there arose the question of whether the allotment, or a party holding under the allotment, was entitled to divert a part of the water reserved under the doctrine of the Waters case to the tribe. The problems to which this question always has been elsewhere discussed.

SECTION 17. TRIBAL RIGHTS IN IMPROVEMENTS

The extent of tribal possessory rights in improvements on tribal land raises two issues: (a) the demarcation of rights between the tribe and the individual member of the tribe who has made the improvements, or who resides on the improved land; and (b) the demarcation of interests between the tribe and third parties.

Of these issues, the first is an issue internal to the affairs of the tribe and therefore dealt with in accordance with tribal law and customs.¹³ Except as statute or treaty otherwise provides, the matter has been specially dealt with in several types of statutes and treaties. Perhaps the most common case in which the ownership of improvements must be determined arises in connection with the sale or cession of improved tribal lands. The earlier treaties generally provided that compensation for improvements was to be paid directly to the tribe,¹⁴ thus leaving to the determination of the tribe itself the question of whether any individual Indian should receive special compensation by reason of such improvements.¹⁵ A few treaties and statutes provide for payment by the United States to the member of the tribe who has made the improvements,¹⁶ and others leave undecided the manner in which compensation for improvements is to be made.¹⁷ The early practice of making compensation directly to the tribe permitted adjustments between the tribe and the individual concerned, but made no provision for the future the case of tribal funds such adjustments became impracticable. When the Act of June 18, 1884,¹⁸ was adopted, containing a provision opening up the lands of the Papago Reservation, improved and unimproved, to appropriation by mineral prospectors, the requirement that damages should be paid "to the Papago Tribe for loss of any improvements on any land located for mining in such area as may be determined by the Secretary of the Interior but not to exceed the cost of said improvements," failed to do justice to the individual Indians deprived of their homes, gardens, and corals. Accordingly, following the referendum vote of the Papago Indians favoring the application of the Act of June 18, 1884, to the Papago Reservation,¹⁹ amending legislation was enacted providing that the individual Indians concerned should receive payment for improvements of which they might be deprived.²⁰

For many years it was the policy of the Government to encourage the improvement of tribal lands occupied by individual members of a tribe.²¹ The Federal Government, having encouraged such improvements, frequently provided, in disposing of improved tribal lands, that the individual Indian who had made or come to enjoy, the improvements should, if possible, receive the lands improved.²² Likewise an attempt was sometimes made to safeguard Indian improvements in making or reserving reservations boundaries,²³ and where lands were ceded provision was sometimes made for making improvements on retained or new lands to take the place of those lost," or for having that portion of the title remaining on its original lands compensate emigrants for their improvements on such lands.⁴¹

The issue of possessory right in improvements that may arise between the title and third parties is an issue which depends not on the internal law and customs of the tribe but rather on the law governing the transaction under which the property in question has come to be recognized as tribal property. Certain statutes providing for the acquisition of land for the benefit of Indians specifically determine that the improvements thereon shall in some way be acquired for the benefit of the Indians.⁴² Under such statutes there is no question but that the Indians have the same right in the improvements that they have in the land itself.

Where the statute is silent, a more difficult question is presented. Thus, where, under the Act of February 13, 1829,⁴³ an improved lands used for agency, school, and other purposes were conveyed in the Yankton Sioux Tribe, the question was presented whether the buildings on such land thereby became the property of the Indian title. The Solicitor of the Interior Department, answering this question in the affirmative declared:

The use of the term "conveyed" implies that the purpose of Congress was to restore to the Indians the title which they held prior to the cession of 1825, that is, the Indian title of occupancy and use, the United States still retaining the title in fee. But the Indian title of use and occupancy is as sacred as the fee title of the sovereign, United States v. Cook (10 Wall 591), and the Indians have the full hereditary ownership with all the rights incident thereto. See 34 Op. Atty. Gen. 177. Whether the ownership of the Indians extends to the buildings upon the lands is essentially a question of what was intended and where that intention is not otherwise shown, it has been held that the Government will be deemed to have assented that its conveyance be construed according to the law of the State in which the land lies. See in this connection Oklahoma v. Texas (235 U.S. 574, 587). The act of 1920 contains nothing to indicate any intention upon the part of the Government to retain ownership of the buildings. They are neither exempted nor reserved in the absence of such an exception or reservation, the rule is universal that the buildings are part of and pass with the land. Isbani v. Morgan (9 Conn. 374, 23 Am. Dec. 361); Oreston v. New Bedford (250 Mass. 894, 96 N.E. 1332); Hale McFall Co. v. Hudson (108 Or. 626, 193 P. 902); Habes v. Scott (222 Pac. 170); Schultz v. Ferguson (231 N.W. 358). Under this rule, the grant to the Indians carried with it the buildings upon the lands.

⁴⁴ Op. Sol. I. D. M. 27671, March 1, 1931.

Nothing in the legislative history of the enactment is as to the contrary. In reports to the Senate and House Committees on Indian Affairs recommending that the bill which became the Act of 1929 be not enacted, the Secretary of the Interior called specific attention to the fact that "there are forty buildings on the land used in connection with school and administrative activities." See House Report No. 1852 and Senate Report No. 1130 on S-2762, 70th Congress, 1st sess. The debates before the House and Senate also show that Congress was advised of the existence of the buildings upon the premises. See Congressional Record, Volume 60, Part 2, 70th Congress, 1st Session, page 8847 and Volume 70, Part 3, 70th Congress, 2nd Session, page 2480-2490.

Aside from the fact that the failure of Congress, with knowledge of the existence of the buildings, to reserve them, reasonably warrants the assumption that no such reservation was intended, the statements of Congressman Leavitt and Senator McMaster strongly indicate that it was the understanding of Congress that enjoyment of the measure would confer upon the Indians ownership of the buildings along with the lands. Such ownership, under the terms of the statute, to take effect when the property was no longer required for agency, school, and other purposes.

It is understood from the information submitted by the Assistant Commissioner of Indian Affairs that the use of the reserved lands for the purposes for which they were reserved has been permanently discontinued and that the lands are no longer needed for any of such purposes. Upon that understanding, it held, for reasons stated above, that the lands and buildings located thereon are now tribal property belonging to the Yankton Sioux Tribe of Indians.

The approach taken in the foregoing opinion suggests that in passing upon any specific tribal claim of possessory right in improvements on tribal land, first resort must be had to the governing statute or treaty. Silence or ambiguity may be resolved (a) by reference to legislative history, or (b) by reference to the state or the common law rule. In general, it may be said that Congress has frequently subordinated the traditional common law rule that improvements run with the land to the equitable principle that one who has built improvements, in good faith, on another's land should not be entirely deprived of the fruit of his labor. Attempts to do justice to the claims of those who have improved tribal lands include provisions allowing non-Indians who have improved tribal lands to sell their improvements at their appraised value,⁴⁵ or allowing Indians of another tribe to pre-empt the lands on which their improvements stand.⁴⁶ As a matter of history, the improvements on land conveyed to Indians were frequently more important indicements of reciprocal cessions than the land itself.⁴⁷

SECTION 18. TRIBAL CONVEYANCES

A. RESTRAINTS ON ALIENATION

It is frequently assumed that the inability of an Indian tribe to alienate tribal land is a consequence of the peculiar tenure by which such lands are held.⁴⁸ This tenure is commonly designated as "occupancy," "mere occupancy," "possession," or "Indian title," and these phrases are sometimes deemed a sufficient explanation for the conclusion that Indian lands are inalienable. Careful examination of the cases and of the historical practice of the United States shows that this view is inaccurate. This inaccuracy appears most clearly in five situations:

(1) If the inalienability of tribal land is caused simply by the peculiarity that tribal land is not held in fee simple, then an Indian tribe which does hold land in fee simple should be able to alienate it. But the decisions are uniform that a title holding land in fee simple is subject to exactly the same restraints upon alienation as any other title.³¹

(2) If "Indian title" is something less than a fee simple,³² then an Indian conveyance of tribal land to private parties should convey something less than a fee simple. But the cases uniformly hold that a conveyance of tribal property under a valid conveyance inquires into the fee simple title.³³

(3) If title in aboriginal occupancy is simply equivalent to a fee simple at will, the land cannot be sold to the sovereign. Yet the practice of the United States,³⁴ and of the British Crown, before 1770, of purchasing land from Indians, and the validity of conveyances thus effected, has never been questioned. As Marshall, C. J., observed, when Europeans claimed "the exclusive right to purchase" they "did not find that right on a denial of the right of the possessor to sell."³⁵

The king purchased their lands when they were willing to sell, at a price they were willing to take, but never coerced a surrender of them.³⁶

The Indian Indians possessed a full right to the land, they retained, until that right should be extinguished by the United States, with their consent.³⁷

(4) If "Indian title" is something substantially less than a fee simple, then in cases of involuntary alienation damages should be based upon something less than the value of the land itself. Yet the courts hold that in such cases the value of the land is the measure of damages.³⁸

³² C. J., United States v. Passa Lumbis Co., 1806 U. S. 467, 478 (1907), aff'd 134 Fed. 208 (C. C. D. W. 1901).

The restraint upon alienation must not be exaggerated. It does not of itself deprive the right below a fee simple [land of alienated land].

Apparently the theory that Indian title is something less than a fee was invented to justify the holding that when the sovereign granted an individual land owned by Indians, and the Indians afterwards alienated the land the grantee was entitled to the land in fee simple. See, for example United States v. Pennington, 10 Fed. 361 (1864). But this result, which seems eminently sensible, can be justified on the ground that the grantee received a contingent future interest which ripened into a fee simple on the happening of the contingency contemplated. Even under the classical theory of land tenure, a grant of a possibility or reversion by the sovereign is not inconsistent with the retention of a fee simple in the Indian title. It must be remembered that a fee simple reversion to classical theory may be either "absolute" or "qualified," or "conditional," and the possibility of death without issue was a standard condition for the termination of an estate. In fact, the general right of reversion was vested in the sovereign, so it was only natural that if a tribal owner became extinct the land would pass to the sovereign and there was nothing to prevent the sovereign from speculating on that contingency and making grants limited to take effect upon its happening.

³³ United States v. Brooks, 51 U. S. 143 (1850), Geoffrey v. Chandler, 10 Fed. Cas. No. 5497 (C. C. Ind. 1841). And note see Ind. of the Act of June 4, 1924, 43 Stat. 376, which declares:

"That the authority of the Executive Board of Chukchee Indians, or North Indians, to execute conveyances of lands owned by said band, or any interest therein, is recognized and any such conveyance heretofore or hereafter made by the said band, or any of its members, shall not be questioned in any case where the title conveyed is the instrument of conveyance has been approved or accepted or approved by the Secretary of the Interior." (P. 381.)

"... the defendants can not now be heard to say that the Indians did not own the land when the treaty was made and had no right to make a cession of it." (P. 600.)

(6) If "Indian title" is something less than a fee simple subject to restraints on alienation, then when the sovereign grants a right of preemption to a third party, there should be a fee left in the sovereign. But the cases hold that this is not the case and that all interest in the land outside of the right of preemption rests with the Indian title.³⁹

These defects in the theory of "Indian title" do not show that all tribes hold property in fee simple in that any tribe can alienate any property at will, but they should serve to direct our consideration of well-established restraints on alienation towards the field of commercial legislation rather than the mores of medieval doctrine that surrounds the feudal notion of "title in the sovereign."⁴⁰

B HISTORICAL VIEW OF RESTRAINTS

The historical fact is that the alienation of Indian lands, far from being a legal impossibility because of peculiarities of Indian title, was probably the chief objective attained by the Indian land law of Britain, Spain, France, the Colonies, and the United States, for some four centuries. None of these sovereigns forbade such alienation but each sought to regulate it, and, generally to profit from it. Thus, the Supreme Court declared in the case of Michell v. United States:

The Indian right to the lands is property, is not merely of possession, that of alienation was concomitant, both were equally secured, protected and guaranteed by Great Britain and Spain, subject only to intemperance and prohibition by the license, charter or deed from the government representing the king. Such purchases enabled the Indians to pay their debts, compensate for their depredations on the Indians resident among them, to provide for their wants, while they were available to the purchasers in payment of the considerations which at their expense had been received by the Indians. It would have been a violation of the faith of the government to both, to encourage Indians to settle in the province, to put themselves and property in the power of the Indians, to suffer the latter to contract debts, and when willing

The naked fee, would transfer no beneficial interest. Leavenworth, L. & C. v. United States, 62 U. S. 742, 743-744 (1870), Brecher v. Weinberg, 95 U. S. 617, 627 (1877). The right of perpetual and exclusive occupancy of a land is not less valuable than full title in fee. See Holden v. Fox, 17 Wall. 211, 214 (1872), Townsend v. United States, 10 Fed. Cas. 193 U. S. 540, 557 (1901), United States v. Shoshone Tribe, 101 U. S. 117 (1879), U. S. v. United States v. United States, 53 C. Cls. 131 (1917). See also, pp. 11-15 of this chapter and cases cited. See also Op. Bol. I. D., 11, 28259, August 24, 1906 (damages for flooding tribal land).

³⁹ Blacksmith v. Pittman, 7 N. Y. 401 (1863).

The lands were then in the independent occupancy of a nation of Indians, and were owned by them, and all that Massachusetts acquired by treaty in the cession to her, was the exclusive right of buying from the Indians, when they should be disposed to sell. (P. 11.)
Op. United States v. Oregon Central Milling Road Co. 108 Fed. 549 (C. C. Ore. 1900), holding that a floating grant to road company did not extend to Indian reservation and claimants.

The intention to bestow the fee subject to the burden of the Indian occupancy must necessarily refer to the temporary character of that occupancy. Here the treaty provided for allotment of the reserved land, and guaranteed to the allottees the permanent possession and use of the tracts so allotted, reserving to the United States the right of sale for the benefit of the Indians whenever their property will be advanced thereby. This leaves nothing to be taken from them, and where there is nothing there is no fee. (P. 658.)

This case was reversed on other grounds in 192 U. S. 353 (1904), and now United States v. Calif. and Ore. Ind. Co. Op. A. G. 9 Op. A. G. 468 (1880) (holding that land may be held by title according to "same manner as Indian reservations have been heretofore held," and yet be subject to trust for named Indians "and their heirs forever").

to pay them by the only means in their power, a cession of their lands, without an assent to the purchase, which, by their laws of municipal regulations, was necessary to vest a title. (Pp 755-756)

Again, in the case of United States v. Perot,¹¹ the Supreme Court declared, in upholding the validity of a grant made by an Indian pueblo

"The transfer of land to the Pecos was made in conformity with the existing regulations established for the protection of the Indians, under the supervision and with the approval of the local authorities, and appears to have been satisfactory to all parties. (P 510)

Again, in the case of Chahton v. Malony,¹² where it was held that an instrument executed by the Pice Tribe amounted to a conveyance to mine rather than a conveyance in fee, the Supreme Court declared

"It is a fact in the case, that the Indian title to the country had not been extinguished by Spain, and that Spain had not the right of occupancy. The Indians had the right to continue it as long as they pleased, or to sell out parts of it—the sale being made conformably to the laws of Spain, and being afterwards confirmed by the king or his representative, the Governor of Louisiana. Without such confirmation and confirmation to one could, in all other, take possession of lands under an Indian sale. We know it was frequently done, but always with the expectation that the sale would be confirmed, and that until it was, the purchaser would have the benefit of the forbearance of the government. We are now speaking of Indian lands, such as these were, and not of those portions of land which were assigned to the Christian Indians for villages and residences, where the Indian occupancy had been abandoned by them, or where it had been yielded to the king by treaty. Such sales did not need ratification by the governor, if they were passed before the proper Spanish officer, and paid upon record. (Pp 236-237)

Similarly did the various colonies, at least since 1633, make provision for the confirmation of Indian conveyances by proper governmental authorities.¹³

Indian grants in Massachusetts Colony, for example, required the approval of the General Court.¹⁴ In New York, under the Constitution of 1777, Indian tribal conveyances required the assent of the legislature, or, after the Act of March 7, 1809, of the State Surveyor-General.¹⁵

The legislation of the United States on the sale of Indian lands has followed the course thus fixed by European and colonial sovereignties, and under this legislation the existence of a transferable estate in land has not been denied but the method of transfer has been rigidly circumscribed. This regulation of land sales by Indians to non-Indians has been an essential part of the general power of supervision over "Indian intercourse," claimed by each of the European sovereigns exercising dominion in North America. This power the United States likewise claimed, in its Constitution, and to this claim many Indian tribes were induced to give explicit assent.¹⁶ The most substantial subject of such interference was land, since this was the most valuable possession of the Indian tribes. The United States asserted the power, as did other sovereign nations, of regulating the sale of land by Indians. As an essential part of such regulation the United States claimed the right, either for itself or for the state in which the land was situated, of purchasing land from the Indian tribes and of extending other desirable purchases from the market, and various treaties asserted to this claim.¹⁷ This policy was paralleled by a policy, which excluded from the Indian country unlicensed private trader, in commodities other than land.

C FEDERAL LEGISLATION

Section 4 of the first Indian Intercourse Act¹⁸ covered the sale of lands, together with other types of trade, and declared

"That no sale of lands made by any Indian, or any nation or tribe of Indians within the United States, shall be valid to any person or persons, or to any state, whether having the right of pre-emption to such lands or not, unless the same shall be made and duly executed at some public treaty, held under the authority of the United States.

This provision was amplified in the Second Indian Intercourse Act, approved March 1, 1793,¹⁹ section 8 of which provided "That no purchase or grant of lands, or of any title or claim thereto, from any Indian or nation or tribe of Indians, within the bounds of the United States, shall be of any validity in law or equity, unless the same be made by a treaty or convention entered into pursuant to the constitution, and it shall be a misdemeanor, in any person not employed under the authority of the United States, in negotiating such a treaty or convention, punishable by fine not exceeding one thousand dollars, and imprisonment not exceeding twelve months, directly or indirectly to treat with any such Indians, nation or tribe of Indians, for the title or purchase of any lands by them held, or claimed. Provided, nevertheless, That it shall be lawful for the agent or agents of any state, who may be present at any treaty, held with Indians under the authority of the United States, in the presence, and with the approval of the commissioner or commissioners of the United States, appointed to hold the same, to propose to, and adjust with the Indians, the compensation to be made for their claims to the lands within such state, which shall be extinguished by the treaty.

This provision was reiterated from time to time with various minor modifications.²⁰ It should be noted that this provision was not intended to prevent the alienation of Indian lands and in fact many Indian treaties thereafter concluded provided for the alienation of Indian lands to parties other than the United States,¹⁰ "notably to religious bodies," "landlords," or other Indian tribes.¹¹ In some instances a patent grant is validated.¹² In other cases, authority is given to some administrative officer, usually the Secretary of the Interior, to sell at public sale,¹³ and in a few cases the title itself is given authority to sell land to a named grantee¹⁴ or to any purchaser.¹⁵ A number of treaties provide for tribal cessions of land by the tribe to individual members.¹⁶ In effect this statutory requirement that all tribal grants be made by treaty simply applied to the American constitutional view the principle that had been developed under British rule, that the consent of the tribe is required to validate a tribal conveyance.¹⁷ This principle is not dependent upon the character of the Indian title and applied to much to land held in fee simple by an incorporated tribe as to land held under any lesser tenure.¹⁸

10, 1934, see 12, 4 Stat. 729, 730, R. S. § 2110, 23 U. S. C. 177. Of the scope of this statute, an opinion of the Attorney General declares:

I cannot think that it applies merely to those Indian tribes who hold their land by the original Indian title. The words are broad enough to include a title holding lands by patent from the United States, and the statute in unambiguous language requires it to reserve this construction. (Christian Indians, 5 Op. U. S. 24, 27 (1837).)

Under United States v. Waddell and Goodell v. Jark it is decided above. (Cottis, 4 Cent. U. S. 495, 501 (1871).) ²¹ See in 870 supra. A similar provision in the Constitution of New York of 1777 (Art. 87) ("that no provision or contracts for the sale of lands, made with or to the said Indians, shall be binding on them, or deemed valid unless made under the authority, and with the consent of the legislature") was construed in Goodell v. Jark (20 Johns 683, 1828). The court, holding that such limitations applied to an Indian holding land under a patent, declared:

This is the provision, and the constitution states one important fact as the basis, and the sole governing motive for the whole of

So hardly has this principle been established that the Supreme Court suggested in the Waddell case, that quite apart from any particular statute, the United States admitted a retention of guardianship towards the Indian people such that even land held in fee simple could not be granted or lost by their action unless the United States was represented by an attorney.²² It is difficult to understand how the appearance of a United States attorney would validate a conveyance of tribal land which is invalid by statute,²³ and the scope of this doctrine remains uncertain.

General limitations on the conveyance by an Indian tribe of interests in real property have been supplemented, from time to time, by special statutes prohibiting such conveyances with respect to particular tribes.²⁴

On the other hand, general limitations upon the manner of disposing of tribal property have been qualified by numerous special acts of Congress. Since 1871, transfers of tribal land have generally been made pursuant to statutes relating to particular reservations or areas, and authorizing sales by the Secretary of the Interior. Some of these statutes require tribal consent in such sale.²⁵ Other statutes validate conveyances by one tribe to another tribe,²⁶ or by a tribe to non-Indians,²⁷ or it and that is, that lands were too often granted towards the Indians in conflict to make to their lands. It was this, and this only, that endangered our peace and trust with them. There was no suggestion of fraud or imposition committed by them upon the white. That would have been a very different suggestion and almost as reasonable as the complaint of the white in the table that the lands situated at below him, was disclaiming him in the equipment of the situation. (Nicom.) Thus, in the resolution of Congress of January, 1870, regulating the sale of the Indian lands, it was declared that the Indians should be permitted to trade with them without license and that the traders should take no account of the state of their duties and interference. In April, 1870, it was said to them that Congress was determined to cultivate peace and friendship with them, and prevent the white people from engaging them in any manner or taking their lands. That Congress wished to give them more and to all them before the Indians, who lived with them on their great island, and that the white people should not be suffered, by force or fraud, to deprive them of any of their lands. And in November, 1870, when Congress was discussing the conditions of peace to be allowed to the six nations, they resolved, that one condition should be, that no land should be sold or ceded by any of the said Indians, either as individuals, or as a nation, unless by the act of Congress. (79, 722-723).

It was immaterial whether the Indians had their lands in communal possession, or by gift or grant from the whites, provided they had an acknowledged title. In either case, the lands were to be sold with title to them, and title to them, and none such ceded, and respect to the law of the land. (79, 722).

His conclusion upon the whole case is, 1. That the patent of John Goodell and his heirs was a patent to him and his heirs and assigns, that civil condition and character might be, whether alien or native.

1. That by the constitution and statute law of this state no white person can purchase any right in title to land from any one or more Indians, either individually or collectively, without the sanction having been conferred by Congress, and their being no theory in law upon which compensation may be awarded by the court. *United States v. by a tribe to its members⁴⁵ which amounts, of course, to allotment. Other statutes authorizing sales by the Secretary of the Interior are silent on the issue of tribal consent. Statutes of this character are generally limited to surplus lands left after the completion of allotment.⁴⁶ Between 1812 and 1912 a number of statutes were enacted authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to sell or otherwise dispose of specific atoms of tribal land to municipalities, religious bodies and public utilities, without reference to the wishes of the tribe.⁴⁷ Questions raised by these statutes are dealt with separately, used in as they present a question of the extent of federal power over Indian land.⁴⁸

Statutes authorizing the sale of tribal lands were superseded⁴⁹ with respect to Indian tribes subject to the Act of June 18, 1934,⁵⁰ by section 1 of that act, which provides:

Except as herein provided to the contrary, with a view to the better management of restricted Indian land and to the interests in the assets of any Indian tribe or corporation organized hereunder shall be made an approved. Provided, however, That such lands or interests may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, be sold, devised, or otherwise be located or from which the States were derived or to a successor corporation, and in all instances such lands or interests shall descend to the devisee in accordance with the then existing laws of the State or Federal laws where applicable, in which said lands are located or in which the subject matter of the corporation is located, to any number of such tribe or of such corporation in any heirs of such member. Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior may authorize voluntary exchanges of lands of equal value and the voluntary exchange of shares of equal value whenever such exchange in his judgment is expedient and beneficial in or compatible with the proper consolidation of Indian lands and for the benefit of cooperative organizations.

The prohibitions of that section have been supplemented by prohibitions against alienation contained in tribal constitutions adopted pursuant to section 16 of the act and tribal charters adopted pursuant to section 17.

On the other hand, the provision in section 4 allowing exchanges of land of equal value and section 5 of the act allowing acquisition of lands by exchange, make it possible for tribes subject to the act to execute valid conveyances of tribal land by deed, approved by the Secretary of the Interior, provided the consideration is land of equal or greater value.⁵¹

D INVOLUNTARY ALIENATION

Generally speaking, restraints on alienation of Indian land apply to involuntary alienation as well as to voluntary alienation. Thus, treaty guarantees of tribal possession are held to protect tribal land against sale by state authorities for nonpayment of taxes and therefore ineffectually, to protect such lands against taxation.⁵² Restraints on alienation of tribal lands which prevent a tribe from making a valid conveyance of its property equally prevent individual members of the tribe from conveying such property.⁵³ Restraints on alienation of tribal lands likewise operate to prevent partition of such lands by state court at the suit of a tribal member.⁵⁴

E INVALID CONVEYANCES

Despite all statutes, Indian tribes have, from time to time, executed grants of tribal land. Although such grants are clearly invalid to convey a legal or equitable estate, it would be unwise to say that all such grants are ineffectual acts that cannot affect any rights. There are at least two federal cases which suggest that rights may accrue under tribal law, though not under federal or state law.

In Johnson v. McIntosh,⁵⁵ Marshall, O. J., intimated that an Indian tribe might make a grant under its own law even though such a grant would not be enforceable in the courts of the United States.

If an individual might extinguish the Indian title, for his own benefit, or, in other words, might purchase it, still he could acquire only that title. Admitting then [the Indians'] power to change their laws or usages, so far as to allow an individual to separate a portion of their lands from the common stock, and hold it in severalty, still it is a part of their territory and is held under them, by a title dependent on their laws. The grant derives its efficacy from their will, and, if they choose to resume it, and make a different disposition of the land, the courts of the United States cannot interfere for the protection of the title. (12 538.)

A similar view is taken in the case of Johnson v. Porter,⁵⁶ where it was held that a grant made by an Indian tribe might be revoked by the tribe and that the grantee would have no redress in the courts of the United States.

A purchaser, from the natives, at all events, could acquire only the Indian title, and must hold under them and according to their laws. The grant must derive its efficacy from their will, and if they choose to resume it and make a different disposition of it, courts cannot protect the right before granted. The purchaser incorporates himself with the Indians, and the purchase is to be considered in the same light as if the grant had been made to an Indian, and might be resumed by the tribe, and granted over again at their pleasure.

If this be the view which we are to take of the Indian right of occupancy, the claim of John Stedman considered in the most favorable manner, could never have been any thing more than a mere right of possession, subject to be reclaimed, and extinguished at the will of the Indians, and which has been done, as will be seen hereafter. But if it may very well be questioned, whether this claim is satisfied even to so favorable a consideration (P 240)

It has already been shown, that admitting a purchaser from the Indians acquires their right of occupancy, the Indians may whenever they choose, resume it, and make a different division of the land, which in the present case has been done by the 8d article of a treaty between his Britannic majesty and the Seneca Nation of Indians, dated the 3d of April, 1794. There can there fore be no doubt, but that the Indians' right to the land in question was ceded to the king by the treaty of 1794, and all Stedman's right of occupancy must then have ceased, and been extinguished, and he stood upon his mere naked possession, without title, and without the right of possession (P 242)

In 1852 the Attorney General in an opinion on the claim of William G Langford, declared

The occupancy of the land by the American Board of Commissioners, in Foreign Missions from 1836 to 1847 was by the contract of a tributary of the tribe, the occupancy by the United States since 1852 has been by its similar consent, manifested by the treaties of 1857 (12 Stat, 937), and 1858 (14 Stat, 467). Chief Justice Marshall, in Johnson v. M'Intosh (5 Wheaton, 544), speaks of a deed well executed in the Illinois Indians, said (p. 791) (Quoting the passage above set forth)

SECTION 19. TRIBAL LEASES

The question whether leases of tribal lands executed by tribes are valid in the absence of statutory prohibition or invalid in the absence of positive statutory authorization can be answered only on the basis of an analysis of the entire course of federal legislation and litigation on the subject.

The first explicit statutory limitation upon the power of a tribe to lease tribal land is found in section 12 of the Act of May 19, 1796,¹ reading as follows

And be it further enacted, That no purchase, grant, lease, or other conveyance of lands, or of any title or claim thereto, from any Indian, or nation or tribe of Indians,

¹ 1 Stat 460, 472. The background of the 1796 act is indicated by the two following quotations. The first is from a resolution proposed by the Indian Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives in 1795 with reference to the rights of states and individuals to extinguish the right of possession and occupancy held by the Indians

That, it appears to your committee, that the Legislature of the State of Georgia, by an act of the 7th day of January last, have contracted and provided for an absolute conveyance of certain portions of lands held by the Creek and other Indian tribes, within the limits claimed by that State under the cession of territory made with the United States, amounting to three-fourths of the lands so held by said Indians

That your committee cannot but foresee great danger to the peace of the United States, in vesting interests in individuals, the enjoyment of which is to depend on the extinguishment of the Indian titles from the constant excitement which they produce, to embroil the Government with the neighboring Indians, in hope of their extinction or banishment

That rights, so dangerous to the general happiness, should reside only in the hands constituted for the guardianship of the general good of society, as being alone capable of comparing the various interests, alone disposed to promote a happy result to the community

That your committee are of opinion, that it is highly incumbent on the United States to contribute to the rights of the Indians, the rights acquired by treaty, not only for obtaining their confidence in our Government, but for preserving an inviolable respect in the citizens of the United States, to its constitutional acts.

to assume that the indentment for the allotment was the appropriation in the title of the benefits which the agents of the board had come there to confer on them. If the power of the board became dissipated to them I know of no law to prevent the nullification of the allotment and the resumption of the land (P 307)

The possibility suggested in these cases, that a tribe may give effect under its own laws and customs to grants that would be held invalid in state or federal courts, assumes that this is a subject not within the scope of the federal statutes and one on which the local law of the tribe is therefore conclusive. Authority for this view is available but not conclusive¹⁰

Speaking of a colonial statute similar to 25 U S C 177,¹¹ Chief Justice Shaw of Massachusetts, holding the statute inapplicable where the land was within a settled community, declared

In the first place, we think it manifest, that this law was made for the personal relief and protection of the Indians, and is to be so limited in its operation. It is to be used as a shield, not as a sword within the bounds of the United States, shall be of any validity, in law or equity, unless the same be made in treaty, or convention, entered into pursuant to the constitution

Your committee, therefore submit the following resolutions

Resolved That it is recommended to the President of the United States, to use all constitutional and legal means, to prevent the Indians of the tribes made tributary to him, from alienating the United States with an assurance, that Congress will cooperate in such other acts, as will be proper for the same end

Resolved That if he should recommend to the President of the United States, not to permit treaties, for the extinguishment of the Indian title to any lands to be held at the instance of individuals or of States, where it will appear that the property of such land, when the Indian title shall be extinguished, will be in partial parcels. And that, whenever treaties are held for the benefit of the United States, individuals claiming rights or pre-emption, shall be prevented from treating with Indians, concerning the same, and that, generally, such private claims be postponed to those of the several States, whenever the same may be consistent with the welfare and defense of the United States

Resolved, That the President of the United States be authorized whenever claims under prior contracts may cease to exist, to obtain a cession of the State of Georgia, of their claim to the whole or any part of the land within the present Indian boundaries and that _____ dollars ought to be appropriated to enable him to effect the same

President Washington in the same year and shortly thereafter addressed a communication to the United States Senate with reference to certain treaties requested by the State of Georgia

Gentlemen of the Senate

Just at the close of the last session of Congress, I received from one of the Senators and one of the Representatives of the State of Georgia, an application for a treaty to be held with the tribes in portions of Indiana claiming the right to certain lands lying beyond the present commonly boundary line of that State, and which were described in an act of the Legislature of Georgia, passed on the 10th of December last, which already has been laid before the Senate. This application, and the subsequent correspondence with the Georgia Legislature, also heretofore mentioned, I have deemed very important. I thought proper to postpone a decision upon that application. The views I have the exclusive method of making grants of leases apparently worked no hardship.

A new situation, however, was created by the passage of the Act of March 3, 1871,¹² prohibiting the execution of treaties with Indian tribes. The passage of this act blocked the only valid method of leasing land while existing legislation permitted.

There is some evidence in the statutes and decided cases, that invalid leases were made by various tribes before and after 1871 and that these leases, although denied legal validity, served the purposes of lessors and lessees.¹³

The 1871 statutory breach in the general ban against tribal leasing appeared in a special act relating to the Seneca Indians, authorizing just invalid leases and authorizing new leases to be made by the authorities of the Seneca Nation in accordance with the laws and customs of that nation.¹⁴

Since February 10, 1876, the date of the Seneca leasing act, various other special acts have provided for leases of tribal land of the Fort Peck,¹⁵ Blackfoot,¹⁶ Fort Belknap,¹⁷ Kaw,¹⁸ Crow,¹⁹ Shoshone,²⁰ Spokane,²¹ and Ojawa²² reservations, the Five Civilized Tribes,²³ and Pueblos.²⁴

¹³ The existence of such invalid leases is discussed in the Dept. H. Comm. Ind. No. 478, 48d Cong., 1st sess., dated April 20, 1874, relating to the Seneca Indians of New York. In accordance with this report there was subsequently amended the Act of February 19, 1875, 19 Stat. 540 authorizing certain invalid leases. See also Quincy v. Stepien, 3 Ind. T. 285 (1900), and 126 Fed. 138 (C. C. S. 1005), in which leasing practices within the Indian Territory are discussed. In the case of United States v. Rogers, 28 Fed. 628 (D. C. W. D. Ark. 1885), in reaching the holding that certain lands were "occupied" by the Cherokee Nation, the purpose of original provision, the court described such "occupancy" in these terms:

The evidence in this case shows that the Cherokee Nation has consistently, and at all times since it obtained the outlet, claimed it and exercised its full ownership and control over it. The nation has collected at different times, a quitrent tax from white men who were grazing their stock on it. Individual Indians have gone on it and leased up large tracts of land on the outlet. Different individual Indians have gone out and lived on it, and now live on it. That since the passage of this law of January 6, 1883, the Cherokee Nation has, by force of arms of the United States, been driven from the outlet, 6,000 square miles of this outlet. That under the provisions of the sixteenth article of the treaty of 1866 with the United States, it has sold tracts of land on this outlet for reservations to the Pawnee, Ponca, Nez Percé, Ojawa, and Mescalero. The very country where this alleged offense was committed, was at the time of its commission leased to the citizenry as a part of the 6,000,000-acre tract. That the Cherokee Nation has not abandoned any part of the outlet except what it has sold; it claims the title and possession of the outlet and of that part of it where this alleged offense is shown to have been committed. The United States, the grantor, has admitted the title to it.

found in section 3 of the Act of February 28, 1891,²⁵ which in its present code²⁶ form reads as follows:

Where Lands are occupied by Indians who have bought and paid for the same, and which lands are not needed for farming or agricultural purposes, and are not desired for individual allotments, the same may be leased by authority of the council speaking for such Indians, for a period not to exceed five years for grazing, or ten years for mining purposes, in such quantities, and upon such terms and conditions as the agent in charge of such reservation may recommend, subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

The Act of August 15, 1891 extended the foregoing authority as follows:

The surplus lands of any tribe may be leased for farming purposes by the council of such tribe under the same rules and regulations, and for the same term of years as is now allowed in the case of leases for grazing purposes.

The foregoing two statutes are, at the present time, the sole statutes of general application²⁷ under which tribal lands may be leased for grazing or farming purposes, except insofar as such lands are capable of irrigation, in which event the Act of July 8, 1926,²⁸ applies. This act extends the permissible leasing period for irrigable lands to 10 years, declaring:

The unallotted irrigable lands on any Indian reservation may be leased for farming purposes for not to exceed ten years with the consent of the tribal council, business committee, or other authorized body representative of the Indians, under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe.

Involving the Act of 1891 authorized mining leases on lands "occupied by Indians who have bought and paid for the same," it has been extended and amplified by four later statutes.²⁹

(1) Section 26 of the Act of June 30, 1919,³⁰ later amended by the Act of March 3, 1921,³¹ and the Act of December 16, 1920,³² authorized the Secretary of the Interior to lease tribal lands within the States of Arizona, California, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, New Mexico, Oregon, Washington, and Wyoming, for the purpose of mining for deposits of gold, silver, copper, and other valuable metalliferous minerals. The 1919 act, as was characteristic of acts relating to tribal property enacted at that time, made no provision for Indian consent to such leases. Leases made under this statute might be "for a period of twenty years with the preferential right in the lessee to renew the same for successive periods of ten years upon such reasonable terms and conditions as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, agent of the United States, to coal leases on lands of the Cherokee Nation." The Act of June 28, 1898, 30 Stat. 490 terminates the making of tribal leases in the Indian Territory (sec. 23), grants power to the Secretary of the Interior to lease tribal minerals (sec. 13), provides for the deposit of rentals in the United States Treasury to the benefit of the tribe (sec. 10), and protects lessees under prior leases executed by individual occupants of tribal land (sec. 24). For other acts, see Chapter 28.

Sec. 17 of the Pueblo Lands Act of June 7, 1904, 43 Stat. 688, provides that no lease made by any public "shall be of any validity in law or in equity unless the same be first approved by the Secretary of the Interior."

unless otherwise provided by law at the time of the expiration of such period."

"The 1919 act in effect extended to Indian reservations in the named State the procedure of exploration and discovery then in force on the public domain."

(12) A second extension of the law authorizing mineral leases on tribal land was enacted about the 19th of May 29, 1924,⁴² which provided that unallotted land on Indian reservations, other than lands of the Five Civilized Tribes, and the Osage Reservation, subject to lease for mining purposes under the 1891 act, should be "leased at public auction by the Secretary of the Interior, with the consent of the council speaking for such Indians, for oil and gas mining purposes for a period of not to exceed ten years, and as much longer as oil or gas shall be found in paying quantities." * * *

(13) Secretarial authority to make mineral leases on tribal land was extended by the Act of April 17, 1924,⁴³ to cover land "on any Indian reservation reserved for Indian agency or school purposes, in accordance with existing law applicable to other lands in such reservation." A majority of at least one-eighth was to be reserved in all such leases, and the proceeds were to be deposited to the credit of the Indian tribe.

(14) The next statute on the subject of mineral leases was the Act of March 3, 1927,⁴⁴ which related to Executive order reservations, not covered by the 1891 act, and made special provision for oil and gas leases, in the following terms:

"Unallotted lands within the limits of any reservation or withdrawal created by Executive order for Indian purposes or for the use or occupancy of any Indians or Indians may be leased for oil and gas mining purposes in accordance with the provisions contained in section 308 of this title."⁴⁵

The foregoing statutes left the law governing mineral leases on tribal land in a patch-work state. This condition was remedied on May 11, 1938, by the enactment of comprehensive legislation governing the leasing of tribal lands for mining purposes. This legislation was advocated by the Secretary of the Interior in a letter to the Speaker of the House of Representatives dated June 17, 1937. As this letter was presented by the House Committee on Indian Affairs, recommending the proposed legislation as the basis of its recommendation, it throws considerable light on the problems involved to be met by the above act.⁴⁶

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
Washington, June 27, 1937

THE SPEAKERS OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES

My DEAR MR. SPEAKER: I transmit herewith a proposed bill to govern the leasing of Indian lands for mining purposes. Under section 20 of the Act of June 30, 1910 (41 Stat. 81), no unallotted lands on Indian reservations other than lands made on any reservation in the States of Arizona, California, Idaho, Montana, Nevada, New Mexico, Oregon, Washington, or Wyoming. Under the provisions of section 8 of the Act of February 28, 1891 (26 Stat. 789), as amended May 29, 1924 (43 Stat. 211), leases for oil, gas, and other minerals may be made with the consent of the tribal council on treaty reservations in all States. Section 10 of the Indian Reorganization Act approved June 18, 1934 (48 Stat. 984), provides that organized Indian tribes shall have the power to prevent the leasing of tribal lands. Under section 17 of that act, Indian tribes to which charters of incorporation have been empowered to lease their lands for periods of not more than ten years. There is at present no law under which Executive order lands may be leased for mineral purposes. The purpose of the bill is the Act of June 30, 1910, except for oil and gas mining purposes, and the tribes are likewise qualified under sections 16 and 17 of the Indian Reorganization Act. One of the purposes of the legislation now proposed, therefore, is to obtain uniformly so far as practicable uniformity in law relating to the leasing of tribal lands for mining purposes. The Act of June 30, 1910 requires the formal opening of lands for prospecting, location, and lease, by the Secretary of Section 1 of the Act of May 31, 1893,⁴⁷ lays down a comprehensive law covering mineral leases on unallotted land, in the following terms:

"Hereafter unallotted lands within any Indian reservation or lands owned by any tribe, group, or band of Indi-Indians, have an application for a lease for minerals other than coal and gas can be considered. It also requires that a person desiring to lease shall locate the mining claims as under the United States mining laws before the Secretary of the Interior. The regulations he must have the lands surveyed if they have not already been surveyed in all accordance with the mining law applicable to the public domain. This frequently involves a large delay and is often quite an expense to an applicant in a lease. Frequently we have known of persons applying for a lease of remaining sand and gravel for local grading purposes, or for the opening of a mine, either for building or other purposes in connection with which there would be little or no interference with mining. In such cases, applicants for leases are required to go through all the ordinary and expensive processes in acquiring actual mining leases. Sometimes the time and expense of making the location and of having the land surveyed are more than they care to undertake although the material desired may be very conveniently located and could be profitably utilized, and consequently the opportunity to lease the land is lost, and the revenue, while perhaps not a great deal in a particular instance, would amount to considerable in such cases through the entire Indian Service."

Section 20 of the Act of June 30, 1910, ^{supra} as amended by the Act of March 3, 1927 (44 Stat. 1281) and December 26, 1924 (43 Stat. 922-923) gives unallotted Indian lands within the States mentioned therein to the Indians, subject to prospecting and leasing for nonfuel minerals as lands of the public domain, after such Indian reservation has been formally deposited by the Secretary of the Interior. It has been held that the Secretary of the Interior has no discretion under the said act in the matter of granting applications for leases of lands having property located on claim and complied with the laws and regulations of the Department of the Interior, and where the same if it has been necessary to avail the laws notwithstanding the fact that the Indians of the reservation were supposed to receive the lands. In other words, the Secretary of the Interior is not to be limited by the fact that the lands are in the hands of the Indians. The Department is in a position to prevent the destruction of a lease by the Indians, and the Department is not to be limited by the fact that the lands are in the hands of the Indians. It is not believed that the present law is adequate to give the Indians the greatest return from their property. As stated, the present law provides for leasing and taking mineral leases in the same manner as mining locations are made on the public lands of the United States. This procedure is not present in applying to a claim on the public domain. For instance, on the public domain the discoverer of a mineral deposit gets a valuable right and can follow the use beyond the side lines, substantially, while on the Indian lands under the Act of June 30, 1910, he is limited to the confines in the survey marked out to exceed 600 feet by 1,600 feet in any one claim. The draft of the bill herewith would permit the obtaining of sufficient acreage to remove the necessity for extrajurisdiction rights with all its attending controversy.

The most urgent change is in the interest of leasing deposits of building stone, sand, gravel and metalliferous minerals. For instance, the well-known iron deposit on the Fort Apache Indian Reservation, extending along the canyon wall for a distance of about 2 miles and 50 feet thick with an estimated value of over 10 million tons, now must be "discovered" and located and monumented and then an application made for a lease. Under the present law only the outcrop along the canyon wall can be taken up under the lease. There are no outcrops of iron ore from the face of the cliff. This is a serious disadvantage, can be leased to better advantage at public auction and in the hands of a private owner rather than to a Government. A small nucleus along the outcrop and applies for a preference right to a lease, although it may be a mile or more from the outcrop. This deposit of iron ore is about 30 miles from a railroad, and anyone interested and considering building a railroad and developing the property would have a very serious problem of 600 feet back from the edge of the cliff. This deposit should be approximately 1 mile out in blocks extending at least 1 mile back from the outcrop.

Coal deposits on the several reservations are not adaptable to the discovery and location system in the present act which has very limited application. The presence of coal is usually not known until a considerable area has been explored, and a reasonable advance before any coal is actually opened on the land. Deposits of coal along the west side of Pyramid Lake, Nevada, can be seen for a distance of many miles but they must be "discovered" and "located" in accordance with the provisions of the law relating to mining on the public domain. There is no one who elects monuments thereon. Deposits of sand, gravel and other minerals are now similarly leased on the public domain. They are well known and could be leased with greater advantage to the Indians in definite areas.

The draft of bill, it is believed, would be a more satisfactory law for the leasing of Indian lands for general purposes. It will harmonize, it will harmonize, it will harmonize with the Indian Reorganization Act, and I recommend that it be enacted.

The Acting Director of the Bureau of the Budget has advised that there is no objection to the presentation of this report to the Congress.

Sincerely yours,

CHARLES F. SMITH,
Acting Secretary of the Interior.

lands under Federal jurisdiction, except those hereinafter specifically excepted from the provisions of this Act, may, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, be leased for mining purposes, by authority of the tribal council or other authorized spokesmen for such Indians, for periods not to exceed ten years and as long thereafter as minerals are produced in paying quantities. Section 2 of the act (25 U S C 380b) provides for public auction of oil and gas leases and "stands the right of tribes organized and incorporated under sections 18 and 19 of the act of June 18, 1934," "to lease lands for mining purposes as herein provided and in accordance with the provisions of any constitution and charter adopted by any Indian tribe pursuant to the act of June 18, 1934." Section 3 of the act (25 U S C 380c) specifies the type of land to be furnished by lessees. Section 4 of the act (25 U S C 380d) authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to promulgate regulations for the enforcement of the act. Section 5 (25 U S C 380e) authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to delegate to subordinate officials power to impose leases. Section 6 of the act (25 U S C 380f) provides that the act "shall not apply to the 'Papago Indian Reservation in Arizona, the Crow Reservation in Montana, the ceded lands of the Shoshone Reservation in Wyoming, the Osage Reservation in Oklahoma, not to the coal and asphalt lands of the Cherokee and Chickasaw Tribes in Oklahoma.'" ¹²

The 1891, 2404, and 1938 acts cover mining leases on all reservations and also grazing ¹³ and farming leases on lands "bought and paid for" by Indians. There is no comprehensive legislation authorizing agricultural and grazing leases on lands which the Indians never "bought and paid for," e. g., lands held by aboriginal occupancy recognized by treaty. There is no general statute authorizing timber leases, but timber sales, which serve the purpose of leases, are made pursuant to section 7 of the act of June 20, 1910. ¹⁴ Neither is there any general legislation authorizing leases for purposes other than mining, grazing, and farming. ¹⁵ This does not mean, of course, that tribal lands have not been utilized by third parties, under permits or under invalid tribal leases, for many other purposes, such as trading posts, power sites, summer cottages, and ordinary commercial development. The character of such use will be further considered in connection with the problem of invalid leases and the problem of tribal leases or permits. For the present it is enough to point to the large gaps in the existing law governing tribal leases, gaps which, it may be hoped, Congress will soon cover.

For those Indian tribes within the scope of the act of June 18, 1934, these gaps are largely covered by section 17 of that act, which provides that the Secretary of the Interior may issue a charter of incorporation for any tribe applying therefor, which charter may convey comprehensive power to manage and dispose of tribal property subject to the proviso that tribal land within the limits of the reservation may not be leased for periods exceeding 10 years. Such charter provisions may of any not provide for departmental approval of tribal leases. Most charters provide for a trial period during which all tribal leases are subject to departmental approval, to be followed by free tribal leasing within the limits prescribed by the act and the particular charter. ¹⁶

3 The Tribe, subject to any restrictions contained in the Constitution and Laws of the United States, or in the Constitution and Laws of the said tribe, and subject to the following restrictive powers, in addition to all powers already conferred or guaranteed by tribal Constitution and By-Laws:

• • • (b) To purchase, take by gift, bequest, or otherwise, hold, manage, operate, and dispose of property of every description, real and personal, subject to the following limitations:

• • • (3) No lease, permits (which terms shall not include land conveyances to third parties) in land now on sale contract by covering any land or interests in land now on

after filed in the Tribe within the boundaries of, or reservation of the Menominee Chippewa Tribe shall be made by the Tribe for a longer term than ten years and in such lease and permits except as otherwise provided in the 6 Upon the request of the Tribal Executive Committee for the termination of any supervisory powers reserved to the Secretary of the Interior under sections 9 (b) 2, 5 (d), 5 (e), 5 (f), 5 (g), 5 (h), and section 8 of this Charter, the Secretary of the Interior, if he shall approve such request, shall (upon receipt of the question) of such termination to the tribe for its decision. This termination shall be effective upon ratification by a majority vote at an election in which at least fifty per cent of the adult members of the Tribe in which at least fifty per cent of the adult members of the Tribe residing on the reservation of the Menominee Chippewa Tribe shall vote. If at any time after ten years from the effective date of this Charter, such request shall be made and the Secretary shall disapprove it or fail to approve or disapprove it within ninety days after its receipt, the question of the termination of any such powers may then be submitted by the Secretary of the Interior or by the Tribal Executive Committee to popular referendum of the adult members of the Tribe acting by a majority vote of the of the Menominee Chippewa Tribe and if the termination is approved by two-thirds of the eligible voters of the Tribe, the

A similar provision, without the 10-year minimum for continued supervision, is found in the Corporate Charter of the Fort Belknap Indian Community, issued by the Secretary of the Interior on July 20, 1917, and ratified by the Indian community on August 25, 1917.

An alternative form of charter, under which supervision terminates automatically after a specified period has been issued to a number of Oklahoma tribes, under the act of June 20, 1938 (49 Stat. 1907, U S Code, title 25, sec. 608) A typical charter, that of the Kickapoo Tribe, issued by the Secretary of the Interior on December 11, 1935 and ratified by vote of the tribe on January 18, 1938, contains the following provisions:

3 The Kickapoo Tribe of Oklahoma, subject to any restrictions contained in the Constitution and Laws of the United States or in the Constitution and Laws of the Tribe, and subject to the limitations of Sections 4 and 5 of this Charter, shall have the following corporate powers as conferred by Section 5 of the Oklahoma Indian Welfare Act of June 20, 1938:

¹³ Special statutes govern the ceded reservations. See, for ex., 463, 464, 465, supra. On Ogea and Cherokee Cessions lands, see Chapter 28. The Papago Reservation in Arizona was created by Executive order on February 1, 1917. The order provided that the mineral lands within the reservation should be open for exploration, location, and patent under the general mining laws of the United States. The subsequent acts of Congress enlarging and extending the boundaries of the Papago Reservation have provided that the lands added thereto should be subject to the proviso of the Executive order concerning mineral rights. Act of February 21, 1931, 46 Stat. 1302; Act of July 28, 1947, 50 Stat. 190, see also Op. Sol. I D., 3121818, October 16, 1938. Since mineral lands of the Papago Reservation are subject to disposition as part of the public domain, the tribe cannot lease them.

Tribal constitutions adopted pursuant to section 16 of the act must be distinguished from charters issued pursuant to section 17. The former determine, primarily, the manner in which the tribe shall exercise powers based upon existing law, and leasing provisions in tribal constitutions are therefore to be read in the light of existing law, tribal charters, on the other hand involve an exercise of power, and leasing provisions in charters are not limited by prior law.¹⁴

Where a tribe has the power to execute a corporate lease, there is administrative determination by the effect that ministerial duties in the execution of such power may be delegated by the corporate authorities to a federal employee but that general responsibility for the execution of such leases and for fixing the terms thereof cannot be transferred to such an employee.¹⁵

Under the foregoing statutes it will be seen that the character of tribal ownership is, generally speaking, irrelevant to the question of whether the tribe may lease tribal lands. An exception to this general rule must be made respecting the Act of February 28, 1911,¹⁶ which is limited to lands "bought and paid for by the Indians," and note should be taken of the early view, now superseded,¹⁷ that Pueblo lands are not subject to departmental control.¹⁸

Within the limits fixed by acts of Congress and regulations issued pursuant thereto, the tribe may specify the terms upon which it will lease land. Thus where improvements for Indian rehabilitation are placed upon tribal land under the Emergency Appropriation Act of April 8, 1935,¹⁹ the tribe may rent such improved lands to needy members and provide that rentals shall be impressed with a trust for a particular purpose.²⁰

Congressional power over the leasing of tribal lands includes the power of controlling the receipts therefrom. It has been held that the tribal interest in rentals is subject to the mere measure of purely congressional control as is the tribal interest in land itself, so that a statute conveying the tribal interest in minerals to allottees raises no serious question of constitutionality and no reasonable basis for a suit by the tribe against the mineral lessees.²¹ Conversely, where minerals are reserved to a tribe for a given period, with provision that they shall belong to the allottee (thereafter, an extension of this period of tribal interest is not unconstitutional and tribal leases, therefore executed have been sustained as valid.²²

Whatever its power over outstanding tribal leases may be, Congress has in certain cases provided that such outstanding leases shall continue in force despite the allotment of the land leased.²³ The present practice appears to be to include in tribal leases a provision permitting their termination in the event of the allotment of the land leased.

The execution of tribal leases which are not authorized by any existing federal law raises a series of difficult problems as to the legal rights of lessors, lessees, and third parties. The statute which denies legal validity to a lease not made "by treaty or convention entered into pursuant to the constitution" does not prohibit the execution of such a lease, and although the statute imposes a penalty upon private persons who, without local authority attempt to negotiate such treaties or conventions or otherwise "treat with any such nation or tribe of Indians for the title or purchase of any lands by them held or claimed," it has been held that this language does not make it an offense to execute, accept or negotiate for an unauthorized lease. This issue was squarely raised in the case of United States v Hunter,²⁴ which was an action to recover the statutory penalty of $1,000 for an alleged violation, by a lessee of the Cheyenne Nation, of Revised Statutes, Section 2318. The court offered the following interpretation of the prohibitory language of this section:

Obviously, it contemplates the casting of a penalty upon one who assumes to act for the United States, and, attempting an authority which he does not possess, attempts to negotiate a national contract or treaty with an Indian nation. But there is another clause in the sentence which renders the question at issue doubtful, that denounces the penalty on every person who attempts to treat with any such nation or tribe of Indians for the title or purchase of any lands by them held or claimed. This seems to refer to an attempt, by private contract and personal arrangement, to obtain the lands of an Indian nation. But what kind of a private contract is denounced? The description is not as broad as in the first sentence, for there it speaks of purchase, grant, lease, or other conveyance of lands, or of any title or claim therein, while here it is for "the title or purchase of any lands." Does this include a mere lease for grazing purposes? I think not. A leasehold interest may be considered for some purposes, a title, and sometimes the word "title" is used in a general sense so as to include any title or interest, and thus a mere leasehold interest, but here it is the title, and this, in common acceptance, means the full and absolute title, for when we speak of a man as having title to certain lands, the ordinary understanding is that he is the owner of the fee and not that he is a mere lessee, and, this being a penal statute, no extended, no strained construction should be put upon the words used in order to include in it not within their plain and ordinary significance. That this is the true construction is sustained by the section immediately following, which reads:

"Every person who drives or otherwise conveys any stock, or horses, mules, or cattle, to range and feed on any lands belonging to any Indian tribe, without the consent of such tribe, is liable to a penalty of one dollar for each animal of such stock."

This imposes a penalty on any one who, without the consent of an Indian tribe drives his stock to range and feed on the lands of such tribe. This implies that an

Some later statutes seek to eliminate doubts on this point by expressly reserving to Congress the right to extend the period of tribal mineral ownership. Act of March 8, 1921, 41 Stat 1866 (Fort Belknap).

Indian tribe may consent to the use of their land, for grazing purposes, or, at least, that if it does consent no penalty attaches, and, if the tribe may so consent, it may express such consent in writing and for at least any brief and reasonable time. It was and is counsel for the government that if a lease on any lands can be sustained, so may one for 999 years, and thus the Indian tribe is actually dispossessed of its lands. But, as was stated in the opening of the opinion, the question here is not as to the validity of a lease long or short, but as to whether this penal statute reaches to the mere holding or negotiating of the lease. To the question I have this answer, it seems to me that it cannot be so interpreted, and whatever may be the fact as to the validity of such a lease, and entering into no discussion as to how far it is binding on the Indian nation, or whether it could be of aid in the option of the nation or by the action of the national government, I am of the opinion that the acts charged upon the defendant are not within the scope of this penal statute. (Pp. 117-118.)

Under this analysis it would appear that the creation by tribal authorities of a lease involving tribal land may lead to the same consequences as the creation of a lease by an infant, a lunatic or a person under guardianship. The lease cannot be enforced, but the execution of the lease is not an offense, and valid rights may accrue under the lease.

Thus, it was held, in Leonson v. United States,⁴⁴ that the United States could not recover rentals under an approved lease if rent had already been paid under an invalid lease. The court declared, per Chief Justice (later Justice) Shannon:

"It is conceded on all hands that Robert H. Ashby, the United States Indian agent, had authority to collect the rents for these premises, and it, in his direction, the lessees under the invalid lease, paid the rent to a representative of the Winnebago tribe of Indians, who accepted and distributed it with Ashby's knowledge and consent, among those Indians, the government would undoubtedly be estopped from again collecting rent for the same premises of one who never had occupied them, and to whom the rents were collected by a representative of the estate quo finient, and distributed with the consent of the trustee among the estate quo finient, it is difficult to perceive how the trustee can again collect the rents. All this repeated evidence was competent, pertinent, and relevant to the point whether the Flominy Company and Nick Fritz, who occupied during the term of the Lemmon lease, held under him or under their old leases from the Winnebago tribe of Indians, and it should have been received." (P. 653.)

A lease, although invalid, may be sufficient to bar a trespass action against the lessee under Revised Statutes, section 2117, above discussed.⁴⁵ Likewise a lessee under a void lease may justify his possession to the point of enjoining a trespasser.⁴⁶ Likewise, it has been held by a state court that the lessee under an invalid tribal lease may execute a binding agreement, amounting to a sublease, with a third party and may recover on a note given by such third party as consideration, in accordance with the principle that a lessee may not question the title of his lessor.⁴⁷ It has also been held in at least one state case⁴⁸ that the holder of an invalid tribal lease may recover upon a contract for the purchase of cattle upon the land so leased. On the other hand, there are some state cases holding that an Indian tribe cannot recover rental under a void lease (although it is intimated that a quantum meruit recovery may be had),⁴⁹ and that a lessee under such a lease who is not in actual possession of the land leased, cannot secure possession of crops grown thereon.⁵⁰

The foregoing decisions leave many gaps in a definition of the rights of lessees, and third parties, under an invalid lease. These questions, however, are not peculiar to Indian law, and courts will probably answer them, as they arise, by reference to analogies in the general field of landlord and tenant relations.⁵¹ Such analogies, however, must be used cautiously, in view of the fundamental principle that, in matters affecting tribal affairs, where Congress is silent the law of the tribe rather than the law of the state must prevail.⁵² In accordance with this principle, it has been held that the effect of a lease of tribal land must be determined in accordance with the statutes and judicial decisions of the tribe. Thus, in Oshagah Coal Co. v. McCaleb,⁵³ where the plaintiff company, operating under an instrument which, though called a "mineral lease," apparently amounted to a "lease," sought an injunction against a trespasser, the court declined, per Chief Justice,

The bill averred . . . that the (Cheyenne) Nation had theretofore lawfully leased five mineral licenses, pursuant to the laws of the Nation, to certain licensees therein named, which licenses conferred on said licensees the exclusive right to mine and sell coal on the various tracts of land described in said licenses. . . . that all of the licenses aforesaid were assigned by, and that the assignment thereto were obtained from, the licensees, by the plaintiff company, in accordance with the laws of the Nation. . . . From any point of view, we think that the bill stated a case entitling the plaintiff, to some measure of equitable relief. It showed . . . that the plaintiff company had an exclusive right to mine coal on the lands in question. . . . (Pp. 87-89.)

Furthermore, it has been held that the judgment of a tribal court on the validity of a lease involving a member of the tribe, the tribe itself, and a nonmember, is res judicata and will not be reexamined in a court of the United States.⁵⁴

In the case of *Baibee v. Shannon*⁵⁵ the court declared:

Much of the testimony in the record goes to show that the lease from the Creek Nation under which appellants claim is illegal because not made in compliance with the Creek laws upon the subject, and because the grant was in excess of the authority of the principal chief. The judgment of the Creek court precludes our consideration of these questions. We cannot review errors of law or practice in such courts, when their judgments are presented to us, unless such errors are jurisdictional. (P. 510.)

Moreover, it has been held that agents of the United States are without authority to remove as trespassers persons holding under an allegedly invalid lease. Thus, in the case of Quigley v. Stephens,⁵⁶ an Indian agent sought to determine a controversy of the Indians, and in fact rendered the service to the defendant of caring for, and feeding his cattle, he was entitled to compensation therefor.

⁴⁸ Kansas v. Y. Y. Land & Cattle Co. v. Thompson, 57 Kans 702, 797, 48 Pac 84 (1897).

Conceding that Thompson had at no time a right, as against the Indians or the government of the United States, to continue in the occupancy of the land, he was there with the consent as to the validity of a lease of tribal land executed by the owner of improvements thereon, and, reaching the conclusion that the lease was invalid, ordered the removal of the lessee. In a suit in ejectment which the alleged lessee then brought in the United States Court for the Northern District of the Indian Territory, it was held that the action of the agent was without legal authority or justification. The court declared:

But whether the deed was void or valid, the rights of the parties to it, its destruction, the disposition of the improvements acquired under it, and the law and the equities of the case, cannot be passed upon or enforced by an Indian agent. The courts alone possess these powers. The Indian agent complies in his decree "that, if this rule were to prevail, beneficiaries could take possession of the country, and practically control the tribes by connivance with their citizens." Whether this be true or not, the fact is—and it is one of common knowledge—that nine-tenths of the farms of the Indian Territory have been opened up, and made valuable by entries substantially like this, and the Indian owners have been the direct beneficiaries. The courts here, without passing upon the validity of such entries, have universally held that, until the improvements provided for in the contract were paid for, the Indian lessor was estopped to set up the invalidity of the lease, and, recently, in harmony with these decisions, by act of Congress (the Curtis bill—Ind. T. Am. St. 1890, §§ 576-578), it is provided that the lessee shall not be ejected until he shall have been paid for his improvements. We hold that the Indian agent had no jurisdiction to try this case, and, therefore, when, at the instance of the appellee, he, using his police for that purpose, forcibly ejected the appellant from the premises, and put the appellee in possession, all the parties to the transaction—the appellees, as well as the Indian police, who is made a party to this suit—were guilty of an act of forcible entry, and that, therefore, the court below erred in instructing the jury to find their verdict for the appellee. The judgment of the court below is reversed, and the cause remanded. (P. 274.)

Whether the foregoing decisions represent sound law may be open to discussion. They raise fundamentally a question that goes beyond the scope of Indian law and revolves about the principle that a lessee may not question the title of his lessor.⁸⁰ We turn, however, in the following section on "Tribal Licenses," obtain some further light on the situation created by legally unauthorized tribal leases.

Whether else these cases may show, they do indicate that a lease made by a title to a member of the tribe, being maintainable only in the courts of the tribe, may be valid under those laws although null and void under federal or state law. Such a view seems to have been implicitly accepted with respect to leases to tribal members in a number of decisions⁸¹ and in a rather extensive administrative practice.

SECTION 20. TRIBAL LICENSES

That an Indian tribe may grant permission to third parties to enter upon tribal land, and may impose such conditions as it deems desirable upon such permission, is a proposition that has been repeatedly affirmed by the Attorney General. Perhaps the most persuasive of the opinions on this issue is that rendered by Acting Attorney General Phillips in 1884.⁸² Three years earlier, the validity of the permit laws of the Choctaws and Chickasaws had been upheld in a formal opinion of the Attorney General, and the Interior Department had been advised that its activities in removing intruders should follow the definition of "intruders" provided by tribal law.⁸³ In 1884, a reconsideration of the question was asked "In consequence of earnest protest against that opinion from among the people of the two nations concerned—the more because such protest is in accordance with the judgments of some members of Congress and other prominent gentlemen from the States adjoining." The Attorney General declared:

In the absence of a treaty or statute, it seems that the power of the nation thus to regulate its own rights of occupancy, and to say who shall participate therein and upon what conditions, cannot be doubted. The clear result of all the cases, as related in US United States Reports, at page 526, is, "the right of the Indians to their occupancy is as sacred as that of the United States to the fee."

I add, that so far as the United States recognize political organizations amongst Indians the right of occupancy is a right in the tribe or nation. It is of course competent for the United States to disregard such organizations and treat Indians individually, but their policy has generally been otherwise. In such cases presumptively they resist all question of individual right to the definition of the nation, as being purely domicile in character. The practical importance here of this proposition is that in the absence of express contradictory provisions by treaty, or by statutes of the United States, the nation (and not a citizen) is to declare who shall come within the boundaries of its occupancy, and under what regulations and conditions. (P. 30.)

Finally no statute or treaty provision compelling variance from this rule, the Attorney General upheld the validity of the tribal laws in question. In answer to a second question put by the Interior Department "whether, supposing these laws to be valid, the United States, through the proper Department, have power to revise them so as to secure reasonableness in the amount of the fees which they require from persons who apply for permits," the Attorney General held:

In conclusion I have to say, that my attention has not been called to any statute by which Congress has delegated to a Department or officer of the United States its power to control such taxation. I therefore conclude that no Department or officer has such power. (P. 36.)

While a tribe may thus issue and condition a permit covering entry upon tribal land, it cannot (any more than could a state) grant an exclusive permit which would interfere with interstate commerce and thus trespass upon a field constitutionally reserved to Congress. Thus in the case of Muskogee National Telegraph Company v. Holt,⁸⁴ the court held that a purported exclusive tribal license to a telephone company could not bar Congress from issuing a similar license to another company. The validity of the tribal license was not questioned, but the claim to exclusiveness "was invalid from the time the grant was made, being an attempt on the part of the nation to exercise a power vitally affecting interstate commerce, which did not belong to it." (P. 385, per Thayer, J.)

Under the foregoing analysis the power of a tribe "to declare who shall come within the boundaries of its occupancy and under what regulations and conditions" exists in the absence of treaty or statute as an inherent power of the tribe. We have already noted that such power is not limited by statutes restricting the power to lease.⁸⁵ The power to issue permits, while neither created not limited by statute, has been occasionally recognized and continued by statute.⁸⁰

There are administrative decisions upholding the validity of tribal permits approved by a superintendent, instead of by the Secretary of the Interior, who is required to approve tribal leases,⁸¹ and upholding the validity of a tribal permit issued to a state conservation department for the establishment of a game station.⁸² Tribal charters of incorporation issued by the Secretary of the Interior pursuant to section 17 of the Act of June 18, 1931,⁸³ sometimes distinguish between leases and permits, requiring departmental approval of leases but not requiring such approval of permits.⁸⁴

For purposes of administering the payment of soil conservation benefits, the Department of Agriculture has ruled that in the case of grazing leases the lessee may receive conservation benefit payments but that in the case of permits neither the tribe nor the permittee may receive such benefits.⁸⁵

The distinction between a lease and a permit or license received administrative consideration and comment with the validity of resolutions made by a Pueblo to members of the Pueblo. The lease legal issues raised thereby must apply equally to transactions between the tribe and third parties.⁸⁶

This distinction has been considered by the courts in a great variety of cases which seek to distinguish an interest in land from a mere license. A recent decision in the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit holds

"A mere permission to use land, distinguishable from that remaining in the owner and no interest in exclusive possession of it being given, is but a license. (Citing authorities)." Tips v. United States, 70 F. (2d) 521, 526.

The essential characteristic of a license to use real property, as distinguished from an interest in real property, is that in the license case the licensee has no vested right as against the licensor or third parties. It has only a privilege, which the licensor may terminate.

As Justice Holmes pointed out, in Alfonso v. Washington Jockey Club, 227 U.S. 534, "A contract binds the person of the maker but does not create an interest in the property that it may concern, unless it also operates as a conveyance." * * * But if it did not create such an interest, that is to say, a right in rem valid against the landowner and third persons, the holder had no right to enforce specific performance by self-help. His only

Put in its simplest terms, the rule is that a landowner does not transfer an interest in his land by allowing another to use the land. Thus, for instance, a member of the landowner's family, inasmuch as he is "a bare licensee of the owner, who has an equal interest in the land," cannot derive from his legal privilege to use the land a right against the landowner or against third parties. Billett v. Town of Mason, 81 Vt. 701 (N. H. 1911). See also Karlson Lumber Co. v. Kolman, 69 N.W. 165 (Wt. 1900). (2p 17-18.)

While it is easy to formulate a theoretical distinction between a lease and a license, there is a fairly large " twilight zone " in which reasonable differences of interpretation may arise. Within this zone the courts have professed to look into the intention of the parties to determine whether the transaction was intended to create a right against the landowner and against third parties, in which case it must be considered a lease, or was intended merely to confer a privilege, in which case a mere license relationship is established.

Even the language of leasing will not suffice to create a lease relationship if the transaction leaves complete power over the land in the hands of the landowner. Thus, in the case of Tips v. United States, 70 F. (2d) 525, the court found that an instrument which used the term "indefinite," "tenant," "lease," etc., was nevertheless a mere license, because the so-called lessee, the War Department, had no power to lease the property or to grant more than a revocable permit to use the property. (P. 10.)⁸⁷

Where the parties intend to create a bare license to use and enjoy tribal property, there is no statute under which the licensee may be barred from the use of such property nor can administrative limitations prevent the tribe concerned from peacefully tolerating such use. Whether, however, such permittees would be entitled to any protection against the tribe in the event of a breach of the conditions of the permit by the tribe is a question on which, unfortunately, no decisions are available.⁸⁸

The terms and conditions of tribal permits have generally been agreed upon by the parties immediately concerned and the practical absence of litigation in this field leaves us without an authoritative basis for answering many questions which might be put. It has been administratively determined that a tribe may grant to an Indian service official a power of attorney to execute grazing permits covering tribal land, but that the Interior Department has no right to coerce the grant of such powers of attorney.⁸⁹

The terms and conditions of tribal permits are prescribed in various of the constitutions and charters issued pursuant to sections 16 and 17 of the Act of June 18, 1931.⁹⁰ It has been administratively determined that a grant of a nonexclusive right-of-way across tribal land is not such a transfer of restricted Indian land as is absolutely prohibited by section 4 of the act cited, but that such a grant is a conveyance of an interest in land and therefore, even though the Secretary of the Interior is authorized by statute to grant rights-of-way across tribal land for specified purposes, such a grant by the Secretary is invalid, in the case of a tribe organized under section 16 of the act, unless the tribe consents thereto.⁹¹

⁸⁵ The permit (Form 5-512) prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior by which grazing privileges upon tribal lands may be granted expressly states that "the Government or the Department of the Interior, except to prevent waste or other injury to the livestock, has no right to limit the number of animals and is not to be taken or construed as granting any leasehold interest in or to the land described herein, but that it is a mere permit, terminable and revocable in the discretion of the approving officer. The permittee, therefore, in our opinion, has no such legal estate or interest in the land so as to give him control thereof. Furthermore, the operator herein only a personal privilege to graze livestock on the land in question, an owner, cash tenant, share tenant, nor a person who acts in similar capacity, he is not within the definition of 'tenant' as used in the act cited."

Whether the fee is or is not held by the United States Government in trust for the Indians, the land after it has been leased is outside the control of the Government or the Department of the Interior, except to prevent waste or other injury to the livestock, and the right to limit the number of animals is a stock grazed on such lands by the lessee to the grazing capacity thereof, the lease conveying an estate or interest in the land for the period of the lease. The lessee, renting for cash, is a third operator by definition, and he has such estate or interest in the land upon which he operates as to give him control thereof. *Memo Sol. Dept. SECTION 21. STATUS OF SURPLUS AND CEDED LANDS

In the preceding three sections dealing with the execution of conveyances, leases, and licenses, covering Indian tribal lands, we have been primarily concerned with the validity as such of statements and with the power of the tribal entities to dispose of private property. When we turn to the subject of Indian land cessions to the United States, the question of validity is no longer a troublesome one. For, as we have noted, most of the historical precedents of Indian land law were designed to encourage the cession of tribal lands to the United States, and the courts have been reluctant to put obstacles in the way of this process.¹² Even where prior treaties guaranteed that no land cessions would ever be made or that such cessions would be made only with the consent of three-fourths of the Indians concerned, the Supreme Court has held that a subsequent statute providing for the cession of Indian land by a majority is entirely constitutional.¹³ The problem in this field is, therefore, primarily one of the construction of treaties, agreements, and statutes, rather than their validity.

In dealing with the status of ceded lands, the basic question that constantly recurs is whether a cession of lands by an Indian tribe has finally and completely ended the interest of the tribe therein, or whether the tribe retains some equitable interest in the land conveyed.¹⁴ Prior to 1860, most of the treaties, agreements, and statutes by which Indian tribes ceded land to the United States provided for an outright and final conveyance, in return for which the Indians received cash payments, annuities, subsistence lands, or other forms of value.¹⁵

For about four decades after the adoption of the General Allotment Act an alternative pattern prevails. "Sparrows" reservation lands, not needed for allotment, are turned over to the Government for the purpose of sale. The Indians are credited with the proceeds only as the land is sold, and the United States is not itself bound to purchase any part of the lands so opened for disposal. Undisposed of lands of this class remain tribal property until disposed of as provided for law.¹⁶

In between these two recognized patterns of "cession and removal" and "relinquishment in trust," various hybrid forms appear.¹⁷

The "cession and removal" formula is found in the Treaty of March 31, 1854,¹⁸ with the Omaha Indians, construed in United States v. Omaha Tribe of Indians.¹⁹ In this treaty the language of present conveyance is used and the Indians undertake to remove from the land ceded within 1 year from the ratification of the treaty. The fact that payment was to be made over a long period of years, in the opinion of the Supreme Court, did not delay the passage of title to the United States.²⁰

A clear case of the "relinquishment in trust" agreement appears in the Act of April 27, 1804,²¹ ratifying an agreement with the Crow Indians. The agreement provided that the Indians "ceded, alienated, and relinquished" to the United States all of their "right, title, and interest" in the lands described. The United States agreed to sell the land on prescribed terms and to pay the proceeds to the Indians, making semiannual reports as to the status and disposition of the sums realized. The agreement specifically declared the intention of this Act that the United States shall act as trustee for said Indians to dispose of said lands and to expend and pay over the proceeds received from the sale thereof only as received, as herein provided.²² Construing these provisions in the case of Ash Sheep Co. v. United States,²³ the Supreme Court declined

It is obvious that the relation thus established by the act between the Government and the tribe of Indians was essentially that of trustee and beneficiary and that the agreement contained many features appropriate to a trust agreement to sell lands and devote the proceeds to the interests of the cestui que trust. Minnesota v. Hitchcock, 185 U. S. 373, 381, 299.

Taking all of the provisions of the agreement together we cannot doubt that while the Indians by the agreement released their possessory right in the Government, the owner of the fees, so that, as their trustee, it could make perfect title to purchasers, nevertheless, until sales should be made any benefits which might be derived from the use of the lands would belong to the beneficiaries and not to the trustee, and that they did not become "Public lands" in the sense of lands subject to sale, or other disposition, under the general land laws. Union Pacific R. R. Co. v. Hart, 215 U. S. 384, 398. They were subject to sale by the Government, to be sure, but in the manner and for the purposes provided for in the special agreement with the Indians, which was embodied in the Act of April 27, 1804, c. 34 at 352 and as to this point the case is ruled by the Hitchcock and Chippewa Trust, supra. Thus, we conclude that the lands described in the bill were "Indian lands" when the complaint permitted its sheep upon them, in violation of § 2117 of Revised Statutes, and the decree in No. 212 must be affirmed. (Pp. 163, 168.)

Similar circumstances were present in the Act of June 14, 1860,²⁴ authorizing an agreement for the cession and sale of Chippewa lands. In construing this agreement the Supreme Court suggested:²⁵

... that the United States has no substantial interest in the lands, that it holds the legal title under a contract with the Indians and in trust for their benefit. (P. 297.)

¹² Accord on Sol. I. D. M 28-108, January 8, 1938. In this case the effect of Art. I of an agreement with the Yuma Indians, ratified by the Act of August 10, 1804, 28 Stat. 280, 832, was in issue. The Substantive of the future Department ruled that although nontribal lands had been continuously designated as a part of the Indian reservation and leased for grazing and mining purposes for the benefit of the Yuma Indians, this administrative reservation of Indian ownership could not prevail in the face of clear language in the agreement indicating "in clear and precise terms a present relinquishment or cession of all of the interest of the Indians in the reservation lands." The unopposed cases of United States v. Sud Johnson and Alm. Sud Johnson, and United States v. M. O. Walker and Mrs. M. O. Walker, decided August 2, 1885, in the District Court of the United States for the Southern District of California, are cited in support of this ruling.

This was not a case the Court pointed out, where the interest of the tribe in the land from which it has been removed ceases, and the full obligation of the Government to the Indians is satisfied when the preliminary or conditional consideration for the cession is secured to them" (P 431). Under the circumstances the Indians had a right to expect that the entire tract would be used as declared in the act or agreement.¹¹

Various other cases are cited to the equitable interest thus found to exist in the Indian title with respect to the land ceded.¹²

Several difficult borderline cases were presented when Congress, by section 8 of the Act of June 18, 1834,¹³ authorized the Secretary of the Interior "to restore to tribal ownership the remaining surplus lands of any Indian reservation heretofore opened or authorized to be opened, to sale, or in any other form of disposal by Presidential proclamation, or in any of the public land laws of the United States." The question arose whether this language was broad enough to cover land ceded by the Colorado Ute Indians under the Act of June 16, 1880.¹⁴ The Solicitor of the Interior Department, holding that such lands came within the permissive scope of the statute,¹⁵ declared

The 1880 cession agreement with the Colorado Ute Indians is one of the early examples of condition if surplus land cessions, in that the provisions of the 1880 act set forth a plan of allotment and disposal of surplus lands which became stereotyped in later allotment acts. A commission was appointed to make a census of the Indians, to select lands to be allotted, to survey and subdivide these lands for allotment, and to cause allotments to be made. The provisions of section 7 of this act, quoted above, are significant in that they provide for the disposal only of those lands within the reservation "not so allotted." The legislative history of this 1880 act makes clear that the chief purpose of the act was the immediate allotment within the Colorado Ute Reservation of the individual Indians of various Ute lands and the opening to disposal of the remaining surplus lands. The opening up of the surplus lands was described as essential in view of the thousands of settlers and prospectors on the borders of the reservation who could not successfully be kept from entering the reservation by military or other means. The plan of allotment of the Indians was favored and actively opposed as the existing wedge in the allotment of the tribes generally throughout the United States. In fact, a general allotment act was pending at that session of Congress. (See House debates on the 1880 agreement, Congressional Record, 10th Congress, 2d session, June 7, 1880, pages 4297-4298.)

From the foregoing it definitely appears that the fact that this cession occurred several years before other allotment cessions does not mean that this cession falls within the entire type of outright cession and removal. This cession was rather a forerunner and a model of later allotment acts and differs in no important respect from these acts. The fact that two of the three main groups of Indians were subsequently not allotted within the borders of the Colorado Ute Reservation does not alter my conclusion. The 1880 act did not provide for establishing new reservations but for supplying the Indians with allotments, and where allotments occurred outside the reservation, the Indians were to be charged a price of $1.25 an acre to be paid from the proceeds of the land sold from the Colorado Ute Reservation. The allotments off the reservation were therefore in the nature of free allotments and, in the case of the Fortmangler Utes, were made only because of the fact that in sufficient allotments within the reservation the Colorado Ute Reservation (See Report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, 1884, at 14, 125 1 seq.)

The fact that the Act of 1880 and the subsequent Act of 1882 provided that the lands ceded "shall be held and deemed to be public lands of the United States" was held not to affect the conclusion that the lands in question were lands in which the Indian tribe retained an interest.

Surplus lands ceded to be disposed of by the Indians are in fact qualified public lands and not qualified Indian lands. They are public lands in that the United States has the legal title and has selected from the Indians in release of their right of occupancy and has assumed to dispose of them, but they are not public lands in the full sense of the term as they are to be disposed of only in limited ways and upon certain conditions. Miners v. Little Rock, supra. It should be noted that both the 1880 and the 1882 acts concerning the Ute land qualified the reference to the land as public land and subject to disposal under the public land laws by stated conditions and restrictions. (Pp 888-891.)

Where ceded lands are held by the United States to be disposed of for the benefit of an Indian tribe, all proceeds from the land belong, in equity, to the Indian tribe.¹⁶ No part of such proceeds accrue to the state in which the lands are located, although such state is entitled to proceeds from the sale of ordinary "public lands."¹⁷ Where such lands are subjected by statute to a flowage exemption, Congress has provided for payment of damages to the tribe.¹⁸

Where surplus lands are disposed of as a result of fraud, the Secretary of the Interior, under proper statutory authorization, may sue on behalf of the tribe to recover the lands lost or the value thereof.¹⁹

The equitable right to the value of lands erroneously disposed of is vested in the Indian tribe.²⁰

Where unsold ceded lands are held to be, in equity, the property of the tribe, it has been administratively determined that such lands are within the scope of the leasing provisions of approved tribal constitutions.²¹

The equity in ceded lands is vested in the tribe entitled to the proceeds therefrom, rather than the tribe on land making the original cession, and ceded lands testament to that ownership pursuant to section 8 of the Act of June 18, 1834,²² become the property of the tribe entitled to the proceeds thereof.²³

The manner in which ceded lands are to be disposed of is for Congress to determine, so long as the promised benefits accrue to the tribe.¹¹ Whether ceded lands are subject to preemption laws applicable to the public domain generally¹² or exempt from such laws,¹³ depends upon the terms of the cession as well as the applicable public land laws.

Where Indians "cede and convey" certain lands to the United States, "in compliance with the desire of the United States to locate other Indians and freedmen thereon,"¹⁴ it has been held that such lands become the property of the United States but are not subject to preemption rights as a part of the public domain and are "Indian country" within the meaning of criminal trespass laws.¹⁵

Where the Indians making the cession are given a certain period within which they may select a portion of the ceded land for their own use, it has been said that "until this privilege was exhausted, the land in any proper sense, belonged to them," and accordingly it has been held that during such period the lands are not subject to "preemption" as public domain lands.¹⁶

It has been administratively determined that ceded lands in which an Indian tribe retains an equity may be temporarily withdrawn from entry as "public lands" under the Act of June 25, 1910.¹⁷

Cession agreements in acts of Congress are generally construed as contracts,¹⁸ and where provision is made for subsequent tribal consent, the agreement becomes effective as of the time when such consent is given, although formal proclamation of such consent may be delayed.¹⁹

The question of civil and criminal jurisdiction over ceded lands involves, in addition to the question of property rights discussed in the Lash Sheep case, other questions which are separately treated in Chapters 18 and 31.

That reserved rights to hunt and fish on lands sold by an Indian tribe are property rights, rather than rights of sovereignty, and are therefore to be exercised under the police power of the state, was decided in the case of Kennedy v. Becker.²⁰ In that case the United States, on behalf of the plaintiff Indians sought to maintain that lands sold by the Semoras with reservation of hunting and fishing rights "became thereby subject to a joint property ownership and the dual sovereignty of the two peoples, white and red, to fit the case intended, however infrequent such situation was to be."²¹ The opinion of the Court, prepared by Hughes, J., and read by White, C. J., declared:

We are unable to take this view. It is said that the State would regulate the whites and that the Indian tribe would regulate its members, but it neither could exercise authority with respect to the other at the locus in quo, either would be free to destroy the subject of the power. Such a duality of sovereignty instead of maintaining in each the essential power of preservation would in fact deny it to both.

We do not think that it is a proper construction of the reservation in the conveyance to regard it as an attempt either to reserve sovereign prerogative or so to divide the inherent power of preservation as to make its competent exercise impossible. Rather are we of the opinion that the clause is fully satisfied by considering it a reservation of a privilege of fishing and hunting upon the granted lands in common with the whites, and others to whom the privilege might be extended, but subject nevertheless to that necessary power of appropriate regulation, as to all those privileged, which inhered in the sovereignty of the State over the lands where the privilege was exercised. This was clearly recognized in United States v. Winans, 193 U. S. 371, 384, where the court in sustaining the fishing rights of the Indians on the Columbia River, under the provisions of the treaty between the United States and the Yakima Indians, entered in 1855, and (referring to the authority of the State of Washington) "Nor does it" (that is, the right of taking fish at all usual and accustomed places) "restrain the State unreasonably, if at all, in the regulation of the right. It only gives in the land such elements as enable the right to be exercised" (193 U. S. 384).

SECTION 22. TRIBAL RIGHTS IN PERSONAL PROPERTY^{22a}

The first white explorers, traders, settlers, and lawyers found the Indians possessing not only lands but various valuable chattels, such as furs, provisions, tobacco, wampum, and, in some parts of the country, slaves. Apparently no attempt was ever made to claim ownership of these chattels in the name of the sovereign, as was done, from time to time, with Indian lands. Possibly this may be ascribed to the fact that the Indians themselves had more definite notions of ownership with respect to chattels than they had with respect to land, or perhaps we may find a more adequate explanation in the historic fact that the feudal system was always pretty closely tied to land and never developed a theory of "seizin" and "fees" with respect to personal property. Whatever the reason, the result is that we are at least spared the confusions that the theory of seizin and fees has introduced into Indian land law. If an Indian tribe or clan owns a man's picture^{22b} or a herd of cattle, no matter how many limitations the law may put upon the disposition of the property, nobody will explain the limitation in terms of a "fee in the sovereign."

Apart from this difference, the ownership of personal property by an Indian tribe raises problems essentially similar to those raised by tribal ownership of realty.

The same diversity noted in the types of interest in real property held by an Indian tribe is found with respect to personality in tribal ownership.

The essential distinctions between tribal property and public property, which we have noted in the field of realty, are paralleled in the field of personalty.

^{22b} Pueblo of Laguna v. Pueblo of Acoma, 1 N. M. 220 (1887).

The distinction between property vested in the tribe as an entity and property held by tribal members in common is likewise repeated in the field of personalty.

The question of who composes the tribe in which personal property is vested does not differ in principle from the parallel question which we have considered in the field of real property.

The problems raised by the concept of "equitable ownership" in tribal realty are repeated with respect to equitable ownership in tribal funds and other personal property.

Possibly a peculiar problem is raised in the field of tribal personalty by the question of when interest is payable on tribal funds held by the United States although this problem shows a basic similarity to the problem of the right to the proceeds of land held by the United States in trust for an Indian tribe.

Another problem that may appear peculiar to the field of tribal personalty, but is in fact basically analogous to problems in the field of tribal realty, is that of creditors' claims against tribal funds.

Because of these numerous parallels, it should be possible to deal with the foregoing questions rather briefly, relying upon analyses already made with respect to real property.

A FORMS OF PERSONAL PROPERTY

The personal property of Indian tribes probably comprises all the forms of personal property known to non-Indians, including bonds, notes, mortgages, monies, credits, shares of stock, choses in action,¹⁰⁰ and debts.¹⁰¹

A tribe may have an equitable interest in personal property held by the United States or by some other party, and, conversely, an Indian tribe may have in its possession funds, which it holds as trustee.

Thus a tribe may hold funds as a trustee to carry out projects for the rehabilitation of needy Indians.¹⁰²

Of all forms of property held by an Indian tribe, it is probable that a principal locus of discussion and controversy has been the category of choses in action and, in particular, claims against the United States and against other tribes.¹⁰³

B. TRIBAL PROPERTY AND FEDERAL PROPERTY

As with realty, the distinction between personal property of an Indian tribe and public property of the United States has been recognized in a wide variety of cases.

The distinction between tribal funds and public moneys of the United States was the basis of the decision in Quick Bear

v. Leupp.¹⁰⁴ In that case the Supreme Court held that payments to the Bureau of Catholic Indian Missions for the care, education, and maintenance of Indian pupils was not in violation of statutory provisions which declared it "to be the settled policy of the Government to hereafter make no appropriation whatever for education in any sectarian school." The Supreme Court said:

These appropriations rested on different grounds from the gratuitous appropriations of public moneys under the heading "Support of Schools." The two subjects were separately treated in each act, and, naturally, as they are essentially different in character. One is the gratuitous appropriation of public moneys for the purpose of Indian education, but the "Trust Fund" is not public money in this sense. It is the Indians' money, or at least is dealt with by the Government as if it belonged to them, as much as it does. It differs from the "Trust Fund" in that the "Trust Fund" has been set aside for the Indians and the moneys expended to their benefit, which expenditure required no annual appropriation. The whole amount due the Indians for certain land cessions was appropriated in one lump sum by the act of 1850, 23 Stat. 888, chap. 403. This "Trust Fund" is held for the Indians and not distributed per capita, being held as property in common. The moneys are distributed in accordance with the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, but the right belongs to the Indians. The President declared it to be the moral right of the Indians to have this "Trust Fund" applied to the education of the Indians in the schools of their choice, and the same view was entertained by the Supreme Court of the District of Columbia and the Court of Appeals of the District. But the "Trust Fund" has exactly the same characteristics. They are moneys belonging really to the Indians. They are the price of land ceded by the Indians to the Government. The only difference is that in the "Trust Fund" the debt to the Indians created and secured by the treaty is paid by annual appropriations. They are not gratuitous appropriations of public moneys, but the payment, as we repeat, of a treaty debt in installments. We perceive no justification for applying the proviso or declaration of policy to the payment of treaty obligations, the two things being distinct and different in nature and having no relation to each other, except that both are technically appropriations. (21 U.S. 311.)

Since the decision in Quick Bear v. Leupp, the Bureau of Indian Affairs has continued to make payments to sectarian schools out of Indian "trust" or "treaty" funds, at the request of the adult Indians concerned. Justifications for such expenditures have been regularly presented to Congress in hearings on Indian appropriations and regularly approved.¹⁰⁵

In the case of United States v. Ewashoff,¹⁰⁶ where the United States sought to recover upon an Indian agent's bond by reason of the agent's failure to deposit certain timber sale proceeds in the United States Treasury, the court found for the defendant, on this issue, declaring:

The mail at which this lumber was sawed was studied by the United States for the Indians of this reservation in pursuance of the treaty with the Umpqua, of November 20, 1854 (10 Stat. 1125), and that with the Molalla, of December 21, 1855, (12 Stat. 931), and in fact belongs to them, and therefore, in my judgment, such lumber was not the "property" of the United States, within the purview of section 3615 of the Revised Statutes, which requires the proceeds of any sale thereof to be conveyed into the treasury, nor was the money received therefor, received "for the use of the United States," within the purview of section 3617 of the Revised Statutes. (21 U.S. 363.)

¹⁰⁴ These agreements are known as trust agreements and contain the following significant provisions: The United States grants to the tribe all of the allocation of emergency funds required to cover the cost of the approved projects excepting such part of the cost as represents necessary administrative and supervisory expenses. The grant is made subject to the condition that it will be used for only the approved projects and that the projects will be carried on under the regulations and supervision of the Indian Office.

In a somewhat similar case the United States Supreme Court declared:⁵⁶

The moneys paid for the Indian lands were trust moneys, not public moneys. They were at all times in equity the moneys of the Indians, subject only to the expenses incurred by the United States for surveying, managing, and selling the lands. (P. 433.)

C TRIBAL OWNERSHIP AND COMMON OWNERSHIP

Tribal funds, like tribal lands, are the property of the tribe as an entity rather than common property of the individual members.⁵⁷

This general rule, however, does not settle the question of when a particular treaty or statute is to be construed as establishing tribal property rights in a given fund, for instance, and when individual rights are established. The problem is apt to become acute when the treaty or statute in question refers to "Indians" in the plural instead of to a tribe in the singular.

In the case of Chippewa Indians of Minnesota v. United States,⁵⁸ a possible ambiguity in the original statute⁵⁹ requiring payments to "the Chippewa Indians in the State of Minnesota" was resolved by the Supreme Court in view of a well-known course of administrative dealings treating the funds in question as the property of the tribe rather than of individuals.

Ordinarily a treaty promise to make annuity payments to a tribe per capita does not establish vested rights in individual members of the tribe, and no such vested right is established by the general statute requiring that payments of annuities be made directly to the Indians rather than to agents or attorneys.⁶⁰ Therefore individual members who separate from the tribe forfeit a legal claim to annuities.⁶¹ As was said in the case of The Sac and Fox Indians,⁶² per Holmes, J.:

The Government did not deal with individuals but with tribes. Blackfeet v. United States, 130 U. S. 308, 377. See Flaming v. McCurtain, 215 U. S. 59. The promises in the treaties under which the annuities were due were promises to the tribes. Treaties of November 3, 1864, 7 Stat. 581, October 21, 1857, 7 Stat. 540, October 11, 1812, 7 Stat. 590. See treaty of October 1, 1829, 15 Stat. 467 (P. 181).

The treaty contracts on which the plaintiff's claims are founded gave rights only to the tribe, not to the members. It was an accepted and reasonable rule especially in the days when Indian wars, still very possible and terrible some, that payments to the tribe should be made only at their reservation and to persons present there. The acts of 1852 and 1867 did not shift the treaty rights from the tribe to the members, create new rights or enlarge old ones. The payments up to 1884 had the sanction of statute. The act of 1884 no more created individual rights than did the acts of 1852 and 1867. It continued

D TRIBAL INTEREST IN TRUST PROPERTY

Numerous statutes refer to funds held by the United States for an Indian tribe as "trust funds" and to the Secretary of the Treasury or the Secretary of the Interior as "custodian."⁶³

The strict language of "trust" is not, however, necessary to establish a trust relationship between the United States and the tribe where tribal personal property is held by the United States.

Incidents of the trust or depository relationship are found in statutes providing for payments out of the Treasury to replace bonds held by the Secretary of the Interior for an Indian tribe and stolen while in his custody,⁶⁴ or to compensate for the defaults of states on state bonds.⁶⁵

E THE COMPOSITION OF THE TRIBE

As has been already noted the question of what individuals are entitled to share in tribal personal property does not differ essentially from the parallel question considered with respect to realty.⁶⁶ The chief difficulties with respect to the proper distribution of tribal funds have arisen in connection with the amalgamation of distinct tribes,⁶⁷ the splitting of single tribes,⁶⁸ and the loss of membership by or adoption of particular individuals.

Where several tribes or bands are interested in a single fund, Congress has sometimes provided for distribution in accordance with respective numbers.⁶⁹

The interest of the various groups of "heredees" in national funds has been a source of legislation⁷⁰ and litigation⁷¹ for many years.

Special statutes occasionally provide for the payment of shares of tribal funds to persons newly added to tribal rolls.⁷²

F. INTEREST ON TRIBAL FUNDS

When tribal funds are held by the United States for the benefit of the tribe, the question frequently arises whether interest on such funds is due to the tribe and, if such be the case, what the appropriate rate of interest may be. Ordinarily this question must be answered by reference to the terms of the treaty, act of Congress, or agreement by which the fund in question was established.¹⁸⁴

⁶³ Act of June 10, 1870, 16 Stat. 58, Act of June 18, 1860, sec. 2, 21 Stat. 201, 202 (Grant and Little Osage).

Under some treaties which amounted to interest payments were designated "annuities."¹⁸⁵

The Act of April 3, 1880,¹⁸⁶ authorized the Secretary of the Interior to deposit such funds in the United States Treasury, in lieu of investment, with a provision that interest should be payable "semiannually . . . at the rate per annum stipulated by treaties or prescribed by law." The Act of February 12, 1928,¹⁸⁷ as amended by the Act of June 13, 1930,¹⁸⁸ provides for the payment of simple interest at the rate of 4 per centum per annum on tribal funds, "upon which interest is not otherwise authorized by law."¹⁸⁹

When tribal funds held in the United States were segregated for pro rata distribution and deposited in banks, section 28 of the Act of May 27, 1918,¹⁹⁰ required as a condition of the deposit that the bank agree to pay interest on such funds "at a reasonable rate." Subsequently, section 324 (c) of the Banking Act of 1933¹⁹¹ prohibited payment of interest in member banks of the Federal Reserve System on demand deposits, and repeated "as much of existing law as requires the payment of interest with respect to any funds deposited by the United States . . . as is inconsistent with the provision of this section as amended." It was administratively determined that this statute superseded the requirement of interest payment on funds on demand deposit in such banks and that such funds might lawfully be deposited in banks not paying interest thereon.¹⁹² This holding was limited to banks which are members of the Federal Reserve System,¹⁹³ and had no application to tribal funds not segregated for pro rata distribution, as to which a fixed interest is due to the tribe.

The Act of June 24, 1938,¹⁹⁴ authorized the Secretary of the Interior to withdraw from the United States Treasury and to deposit in banks tribal funds "on which the United States is not obliged by law to pay interest at higher rates than can be procured from the banks."

Although the right of an Indian tribe to interest in connection with recovery against the United States is beyond the scope of this chapter, we may note the general rule laid down by Taft, C. J., in Cherokee Nation v. United States,¹⁹⁵ based upon section 177 of the Indian Code:

. . . we should begin with the premise, well established by the authorities, that a recovery of interest against the United States is not authorized under a special Act referring to the Court of Claims; I am founded upon a conflict with the United States, unless the conflict or the Act expressly authorizes such interest."

G CREDITORS' CLAIMS

The question of whether funds due to or held in trust for the tribe by the United States should be subjected to the claims of creditors, has been expressly covered in a number of special statutes relating to the disposition of such funds.¹⁹⁶ In a few cases general payment by the Secretary of the Interior to all of the creditors of a given tribe is authorized, but generally the statute authorizes payment of a designated claim, based either upon tribal agreement,¹⁹⁷ or upon depredations.¹⁹⁸ General legislation on depredation claims authorized the Court of Claims to adjudicate such claims in suits against the United States, with permission to interested Indians to appear as parties defendant.¹⁹⁹ Judgments rendered against Indian tribes were to be satisfied out of annuities, other funds, or any appropriations for the benefit of the tribe, and, if all these sources failed, from the Treasury of the United States, such payments to be repaid-salable out of future tribal annuities, funds, or appropriations. Thereafter the regular appropriation acts authorized the Secretary of the Interior to make payments to successful claimants under the Act of March 3, 1891, by defining such sums from tribal funds, having the regard for the educational and other necessary requirements of the tribe or tribes affected.²⁰⁰

The general rule is that tribal funds held by the United States, will not be subjected to claims of third parties unless payment of such claims is clearly authorized by statute or treaty,²⁰¹ or by lawful action of the tribe itself.²⁰²

SECTION 23. TRIBAL RIGHT TO RECEIVE FUNDS

The right of an Indian tribe to receive funds or other personal property from the United States or from third parties depends, of course, upon the language of the treaty, statute, or agreement, in which such promise of payment appears.²⁰⁴ In this section

²⁰⁴ The right of an Indian tribe to recover funds, apart from agreement, by reason of torts committed against it, is treated elsewhere, in

we shall attempt to determine the principal sources of tribal rights to income, and to analyze the manner in which such payments are handled.

Chapter 14. The right to compensation under eminent domain proceedings is devoted to in sec. 11 supra. Powers with respect to taxes and fees are treated in Chapter 7.

A. SOURCES OF TRIBAL INCOME

The principal source of tribal income, at least since the Revolution, has been the sale of tribal resources—chiefly land, timber, minerals, and water power. Since sale of such resources was, for more than a century, largely restricted to the United States, most of the tribal income received prior to 1863, when the first general leasing law was enacted,¹⁰⁰ was paid to the tribe by the United States. Failure to appropriate the bulk of such payments helped to create the popular misconception that all payments made by the United States to Indians were matters of charity. An illustration of this sentiment is found in section 3 of the Act of June 22, 1871,¹⁰¹ which provides that aboriginal-made Indians receiving supplies pursuant to appropriation acts should perform useful labor "for the benefit of themselves or of the tribe, at a reasonable rate, to be fixed by the agent in charge, and to an amount equal in value to the supplies to be delivered."

The popular outcry that would have followed the application of a similar rule to white holders of Government bonds or pensions may well be imagined.

It is important to recognize that funds due to Indian tribes under treaties and agreements were viewed by the Indians either as commercial debts for value received or as intensions due from a foe in war. The fact that such payments were often received by the public and by many administrators, helped to explain some of the latter controversies, which formerly were decided on the field of battle and are now decided in the Court of Claims.

In numerous treaties, agreements, and statutes, the United States has agreed to pay money to an Indian tribe, in consideration of land cessions or other disposition of Indian property.¹⁰² Where the tribal organization permitted, provision was frequently made that payment should go directly to the treasurer of the tribe, in other cases payments were to be made to chiefs, or to heads of families, or per capita to all adults, in some cases payment was to be made in goods or services.¹⁰³

Many of the early treaties provided for payments to be made in goods.¹⁰⁴

Ordinarily payments promised in a treaty and paid in annual installments called annuities¹⁰⁵ were due to the tribe, and like obligations of one nation to another, were deemed satisfied when the tribal authorities had received the funds in question.¹⁰⁶ For the United States to have presumed to satisfy its obligation by direct payment to the individual members of the tribe would have been a departure from the canons of international law to which the Federal Government was trying to assimilate its relationship with the Indian tribes. Furthermore, payments to tribal authorities saved the Federal Government from the necessity of making difficult adjudications that might lead to dissatisfaction. On the other hand, payments to tribal authorities sometimes led to worse dissatisfactions on the part of individual members of the tribes who considered themselves discriminated against, and so the practice grew up of receiving to the United States, by treaty provision, the right to distribute to the members of the tribe the moneys or goods owing to the tribe.¹⁰⁷ Occasionally the treaty provided that this distribution was to be made on the basis of an agreement between the tribal authorities and the agents of the Federal Government.¹⁰⁸

¹⁰⁶ This was so self-evident that most of the early treaties did not mention the fact. A few treaties, however, did make explicit the understanding that distribution of payments made to the tribe was to be in the hands of the tribal authorities. Treaty of September 3, 1838, with the Menominee Nation of Indiana, 7 Stat. 309, 401; Treaty of May 30, 1854, with the Mississippi bands of Chickasaw Indians, 10 Stat. 1103. Other treaties emphasized this understanding, without making it explicit, by providing that the United States reserve the right to apportion annuities among the different bands or tribes with which a single treaty was made, but reserving no similar right to apportion funds within a band or tribe. Treaty of July 27, 1853, with the Comanche, Kiowa, and Apache tribes or nations of Indian, 10 Stat. 1015; Treaty of September 30, 1864, with the Chickasaw Indians of Lake Superior and the Mississippi, 10 Stat. 1109.

¹⁰⁷ At last these treaties provided simply that the United States might "divide the land annuity among the individuals of the said tribe." Treaty of December 30, 1803, with the Piankashaw, 7 Stat. 100. In the Treaty of January 8, 1821, with the Choctaw, 7 Stat. 210, per capita distribution is promised in order to remove "any dissention which may have arisen in the Choctaw Nation, in consequence of an thousand dollars of their annuity having been appropriated annually, for sixteen years, by some of the chiefs, for the support of their schools." Other treaties promising equal distribution are Treaty of October 4, 1842, with the Chickasaw Indians of the Mississippi and Lake Superior, 7 Stat. 591; Treaty of January 4, 1843, with the Creek and Seminole Tribes of Indiana, 8 Stat. 821; Treaty of March 17, 1842, with the Wyandott Nation of Indiana, 11 Stat. 681. Later treaties generally reserved a more comprehensive right in the President of the United States to determine how moneys due to the Indian tribe should be paid to the members of the tribe or expended for their use and benefit. Treaty of March 18, 1851, with the Omaha tribe of Indians, 10 Stat. 1043; Treaty of May 9, 1851, with the Delaware tribe of Indians, 10 Stat. 1049; Treaty of June 5, 1861, with the Miami tribe of Indiana, 10 Stat. 1008; Treaty of October 17, 1855, with the Blackfoot and other tribes of Indians, 11 Stat. 607; Treaty of January 22, 1855, with the Delaware and other tribes of Indians in the Territory of Washington, 11 Stat. 627; Treaty of January 28, 1855, with the Flathead, 12 Stat. 685; Treaty of January 21, 1855, with the Makah tribe of Indians, 12 Stat. 680; Treaty of June 20, 1855, with the Confederated tribes of Indians in Middle Oregon, 12 Stat. 908; Treaty of July 1, 1855, with Quana-ait and Quil-ah-ut Indians, 12 Stat. 911; Treaty of February 18, 1861, with the Confederated tribes of Arapaho and Cheyenne Indians, 12 Stat. 1105; Treaty of March 8, 1865, with the Omaha Tribe of Indians, 14 Stat. 607; Treaty of September 20, 1865, with the Great and Little Osage Indians, 14 Stat. 687; Treaty of March 2, 1868, with the Flathead Indians, 14 Stat. 618.

Generally such per capita payments comprised only a portion of the funds due to the tribe, the remainder of such funds being invested or expended in other ways.¹³¹ Occasionally an Indian treaty provided for complete per capita distribution of tribal funds.¹³² Since 1871, and particularly during the years following the General Allotment Act, when per capita distribution of property was looked upon as an effective means of destroying tribal organization, numerous statutes provided for per capita payment of tribal funds.¹³³

In recent decades compensation to Indian tribes for land or other property has generally taken the form of statutory provisions requiring that certain sums be placed "to the credit of" a given tribe.¹³⁴ Frequently specific provision is made covering the interest to be paid upon the fund and covering also the purposes for which and the manner in which the fund may be expended. Where a tribe has several different funds to its credit the statute, if clearly drafted, specifies the particular fund to which the sum in question is to be added.

Some statutes merely provide that funds shall be deposited in the United States Treasury and be subject to appropriations by the Congress for a designated group or tribe of Indians.¹³⁵

Since 1847 the President has been empowered, in his discretion, to pay over money, due to Indian tribes to the members thereof, per capita, instead of to the officers or agents of the tribe.¹³⁶ Questions of interpretation, however, continued to arise even after the 1847 statute.

Where the manner of payment is in issue it has been said that a requirement of execution of a receipt or release by the tribe indicates that payment to tribal officers rather than heads of families is intended.¹³⁷

Again, it has been said

Ordinarily a debt due to a nation, by a treaty, ought to be paid to the constituted authorities of the nation, but where the treaty and the law appropriating the money both direct the payment to all the individuals of the nation per capita, the treaty and the statute must prevail.¹³⁸

The statutes dealing with payments due from the United States to Indian tribes represented, until the end of the nineteenth century, the chief source of tribal income, supplemented only sporadically by special statutes or treaties authorizing the leasing or sale of tribal lands to other Indian tribes,¹³⁹ or to non-Indians.

A further source of income of considerable importance during recent decades is constituted by judgment awards in suits against the United States.

In recent years, various jurisdictional acts have provided that no part of the judgment that may be awarded pursuant to the act shall be paid out in per capita payments to the Indians concerned.¹⁴⁰

This proviso represents a well established tendency to devote recoveries from judgments in claim cases to the rebuilding of the entire tribal estate rather than to temporary payments which are easily dissipated.

An important source of income due to Indian tribes from non-governmental sources developed with the building of railroads across Indian reservations.¹⁴¹

Most of the statutes which grant rights-of-way to railroads or other transportation or communication companies provide for payment of compensation to the Indian tribe. A majority of the statutes relating to railroads contain the phrase "that the ¹³⁶Act of March 4, 1847, see 8, 9 Stat. 208, amending Act of June 8, 1854, see 11, 4 Stat. 735, 737. The 1847 provision was subsequently embodied, with other material, in R. S. § 2096 and 25 U. S. C. 111.

¹³⁷"The direction that the money shall be paid to the Creek nation is not decisive, because payment to the heads of families is a mode of making payment to the nation. But the condition that a release of all claim for the whole sum shall first be executed by the Creek nation, is not equivocal, because such a release could not be executed by the heads of families or by individuals. And when the act directs that the payment shall be made to the Creek nation, and that the release shall be executed by the Creek nation, the inference would seem to be very strong against a distribution per capita. But when the act goes one step further, and requires that the persons to whom the money shall be paid shall make satisfactory proof that they have full power and authority to receive and receipt for the same, the inference becomes irresistible against a distribution and payment to heads of families, which would be entirely irreconcilable with this provision." (Pp. 46-48) Payment of Certain Monies to the Creeks, 5 Op. A. G. 46, 48-49 (1848). The later portion of this opinion, apparently inconsistent with the above quotation, was revised in 5 Op. A. G. 95 (1849). Cf. Payment of Certain Monies to the Cheerokees, 5 Op. A. G. 830 (1851).

¹³⁹Various early statutes provided for payment by one Indian tribe to another in connection with intertribal land transactions. See, for example, Act of June 8, 1874, 17 Stat. 228 (payment by Kansas Tribe to Osage Tribe).

said railway company shall pay to the Secretary of the Interior, for the benefit of the particular nation or tribes through whose lands said line may be located," a specified sum,⁴² which is frequently fixed at $50 per mile of road. In a few instances similar language referring to a definite tribe is used instead of the more general language above noted.⁴³ A few statutes provide that the railway company shall pay the required sum "to the Secretary of the Interior, for the benefit of the particular nation or tribes or individuals (through whose lands said line may be located)." A few statutes provide simply for payment directly to the tribe concerned.⁴⁴ Other statutes provide for payment without specifying the manner of such payment.⁴⁵

In 1881 the matter of railroad rights-of-way, hitherto dealt with in piecemeal legislation, was covered by a general statute⁴⁶ which provided:

Sec. 5. That where a railroad is constructed under the provisions of an Act through the Indian Territory there shall be paid by the railroad company to the Secretary of the Interior, for the benefit of the particular nation or tribe through whose lands the road may be located, such an annual bonus as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, not more than fifteen dollars for each mile of road, the same to be paid so long as said land shall be owned and occupied by such nation or tribe, which payment shall be in addition to the compensation otherwise required herein.

The various general statutes authorizing the leasing of Indian lands, and other forms of disposition of Indian tribal property which have been authorized in earlier sections of this chapter, generally provide that the proceeds from such transactions shall be deposited to the credit of the tribe concerned.

ever, to the limitations as to tribal funds imposed by section 27 of the Act of May 28, 1916 (Thirty-ninth 81 statutes at Large, page 350) ⁴⁰.

That this act does not limit the power of an Indian tribe to receive payments based on use of tribal land was the view taken by the Department of the Interior in holding that tribes organized under section 16 of the Act of June 18, 1934, but not incorporated under section 17, might deposit such receipts in their own treasury. This conclusion was concurred in by the Comptroller General. The position of the Interior Department and of the Comptroller General is set forth in an Opinion of the Comptroller General dated June 30, 1947, ⁴¹ from which the following excerpts are taken:

"... the act of May 27, 1926 (44 Stat. 500), amending the act of March 1, 1881 (22 Stat. 790), governs the use of revenues received by officials or employees of the Interior Department, and has no application to such payments as may lawfully be made to tribal officers under the provisions of the act of June 18, 1934, and constitutions adopted thereunder and approved by the Secretary of the Interior. The legislative history of the act of 1881 and the act of 1926 shows that these statutes were designed to control and regulate departmental receipts and accounts. They were not intended to regulate or to prohibit payments made directly to tribal officers."

"The question of whether an organized tribe may enter into negotiations and agreements respecting the use of tribal land and require payment to a regularly bonded tribal officer, in the case of such agreements, as payment of an administrative question to be determined by the Secretary of the Interior in consideration of such factors as the experience of the Indian tribe in handling funds, the amount of the funds involved, the extent of the activity undertaken by tribal officers or other members of the tribe in developing sources of tribal revenue, and similar factors."

"Under Article IX, section 8 of the Constitution of the Gila River Pima-Maricopa Indian Community, those community lands which are not reserved to particular individuals for their private benefit or to groups of individuals operating as districts may be used by the community or may be leased by the council to members of the community, rentals to accrue to the community treasury to be used for the support of the highways or other public purposes. This provision supersedes prior administrative regulations requiring all leases to be approved by the superintendent of the agency and further requiring that all payments made on the leases should be deposited in the United States Treasury. Under the present constitutional provisions the receipts in question are not revenues or receipts of the United States, the agreements from which they arise are not agreements approved by the superintendent and consequently such receipts are not affected by the act of May 17, 1926, or regulations issued thereunder with respect to the accounting and deposit of tribal trust funds."

"Article VIII, section 5 of the Constitution of the Cheyenne River Sioux Tribe, above referred to, provides: 'Tribal lands may be leased by the tribal council, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, for such periods of time as are permitted by law.' Nothing is said in this section or in any other section of the constitution as to whether rentals paid under such leases shall be paid to the disbursing agent of the reservation or deposit in the United States Treasury or to the bonded treasurer of the tribe for deposit in the tribal treasury. Presumably this is left, like the other terms of the lease, to the discretion of the Tribal Council and the Secretary of the Interior."

"The additional powers granted in the new act do not expressly mention the control by the tribe of their own moneys, and there is, therefore, some doubt whether such authorization was intended. However, having in view the broad purposes of the act as shown by its legislative history, to extend to Indians the fundamental rights of political liberty and local self-government, and there having been shown the fact that some of the powers so granted by the new act would require the use of tribal funds for their accomplishment—being necessary incidents of such power—and the further fact that the act of June 27, 1934 (48 Stat. 362), providing that section 20 of the Permanent Appropriation Deposit Act, 48 Stat. 1228, shall not apply to funds held in trust for individual Indians, associations of individual Indians, or for Indian corporations chartered under the act of June 18, 1934, this office would not be required to object to the measures suggested in your memorandum for the handling of tribal funds of Indian tribes organized pursuant to the said act of June 18, 1934."

Whether the conclusion in which the Secretary of the Interior and the Comptroller General agreed, in the case of an organized tribe, applied equally to an unorganized tribe remains uncertain. Implicit in this problem is the question of whether legislation such as the 1934 act has any application to funds in the possession of an Indian tribe. To this question we shall return in the final section of this chapter.

B. MANNER OF MAKING PAYMENTS TO TRIBE

Although a good deal of the foregoing discussion has dealt inevitably with the manner as well as the source of payments made to an Indian tribe, it remains to note the various general statutes which have regulated the manner of making such payments. Generally such statutes have been limited to details of payment not covered by the treaty or act under which the payment is due. But in certain cases grave questions have arisen as to the compatibility between the statutes, creating the debt and the statutes determining the manner of its discharge.

For the most part, these statutes are designed to guard against fraud and embezzlement in the distribution of funds and supplies. The Act of June 30, 1894,⁴² contained two general provisions covering the payment of Indian annuities:

Sec. 11. And he it further enacted, That the payment of all annuities or other sums stipulated by treaty to be made to any Indian tribe, shall be made to the chiefs of such tribe, or to such person as said tribe shall appoint, or if any tribe shall appropriate their annuities to the purpose of education, or to any other specific use, then to such person or persons as such tribe shall designate.

Sec. 12. And he it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for the President of the United States, at the request of any Indian tribe to which any annuity shall be payable in money, to cause the same to be paid in goods, purchased as provided in the next section of this act. (P. 737.)

An subsequently amended,⁴³ these provisions are embodied in the United States Code in the following form:

§ 111. Payment of annuities and distribution of goods. The payment of all moneys and the distribution of all goods stipulated to be furnished to any Indians, or tribe of Indians, shall be made in one of the following ways, as the President or the Secretary of the Interior may direct:

First. To the chiefs of a tribe, for the tribe.

Second. In cases where the impetuous interest of the tribe or the individuals intended to be benefited, or any treaty stipulation, requires the intervention of an agency, then to such person as the tribe shall appoint to receive such moneys or goods; or if several persons be appointed, then upon the joint order or receipt of such persons.

Third To the heads of the families and to the individuals entitled to participate in the moneys or goods.

Fourth By consent of the tribe, such moneys or goods may be applied directly, under such regulations, not inconsistent with treaty stipulations, as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior to such purposes as will best promote the happiness and prosperity of the members of the tribe, and will encourage able-bodied Indians in the habits of industry and peace.

Various other early statutes still in force require civil and military officers to certify to the actual delivery of goods owing to Indians,⁶⁰ authorize the President to require that payments and deliveries be made by the various superintendents,⁶¹ permit payment of annuities in rum,⁶² or goods (at the request of the tribe)⁶³ authorize Indians 18 years of age or over to receive annuities,⁶⁴ require the Secretary of the Interior to designate discharging officers handling per capita payments,⁶⁵ extend these safeguards to the payment of judgment moneys,⁶⁶ require the presence of the "original package" when goods are distributed,⁶⁷ and require reports as to the status of tribal head affairs generally,⁶⁸ "revenueable accounts,"⁶⁹ and attendance records for the occasions when goods are distributed.⁷⁰

The foregoing statutes are designed primarily to protect the Indians against lax or dishonest officials. A separate body of legislation is directed against immorality on the part of the Indians.

Section 8 of the Act of March 3, 1847,⁷¹ as it appears today in title 25 of the United States Code, provides:

§ 130 Withholding of moneys or goods on account of intoxicating liquors. No moneys, or moneys, or goods, shall be paid or distributed to Indians while they are under the influence of any description of intoxicating liquor, nor while there are good and sufficient reasons leading the officers or agents, whose duty it may be to make such payments or distribution, to believe that there is any species of intoxicating liquor within convenient reach of the Indians, nor until the chiefs and headmen of the tribe shall have pledged themselves to use all their influence and to make all proper exertions to prevent the introduction and sale of such liquor in their country.

The Act of March 2, 1847,⁷² still in force, forbids the payment of treaty funds to an Indian tribe which, since the last distribution of funds, "has engaged in hostilities against the United States, or against its citizens." U. S. C. The Act of April 10, 1850, also still in effect, forbids delivery of goods pursuant to treaty to chiefs who have violated a treaty.⁷³ the beneficiaries of obligations from the United States, to perform useful labor in order to secure the sums or supplies owing them. At various times provisions were made that tribes at war with the United States should not receive annuities or appropriations. Thus, section 2 of the Appropriation Act of March 3, 1875,⁷⁵ provided:

That none of the appropriations herein made, or of any appropriations made for the Indian service, shall be paid to any band of Indians of any portion of any band while at war with the United States or with the white citizens of any of the States or Territories. (P. 449)

Section 1 of the same act, now embodied in the United States Code as section 129 of title 25, provides:

The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to withhold, from any tribe of Indians who may hold any captives other than Indians, any moneys due them from the United States until said captives shall be surrendered to the lawful authorities of the United States.

A third type of statute governing federal payments and distributions is concerned with the issue of tribal payments versus individual payments. During the allotment period a persistent effort was made to individualize annuities and funds, for approximately the same reasons that created the desire to individualize land.

The Appropriation Act of March 8, 1877,⁷⁶ contained a direction to each agent having supplies to distribute—to make out rolls of the Indians entitled to supplies at the agency, with the names of the Indians and of the heads of families or lodges, with the number in each family or lodge, and to give out supplies to the heads of families, and not the heads of tribes or bands, and not to give out supplies for a greater length of time than one week in advance. Provided, however, That the Commissioner of Indian Affairs may, in his discretion, issue supplies for a greater period than one week to such Indians as are peaceably located upon their reservation and engaged in agriculture.

The purpose of this provision was apparently to break down the tribal cult of chiefs which might exercise through the distribution of food and clothing and to transfer the prestige attached to such offices to the Indian agents.

The Act of March 2, 1907,⁷⁷ authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to apportion "tribal or trust funds on deposit in the Treasury of the United States" among the members of the tribe concerned.⁷⁸

General segregation and distribution of tribal funds to members appearing on "final rolls" made by the Secretary of the Interior was authorized by section 28 of the Act of May 25, 1918,⁷⁹ and section 1 of the Act of June 30, 1919.⁸⁰ The repeal of the distribution features of the latter statute by the Act of June 24, 1938,⁸¹ parallels the termination of the allotment policy.

SECTION 24. TRIBAL RIGHT TO EXPEND FUNDS

Since the United States and the Indian tribe have each an interest in tribal funds held in the Treasury of the United States, the normal method of disposing of such funds has been by common consent of the tribe and the Federal Government. So far as treaty funds are concerned, treaty provisions, many of which are still in force, embodied a common agreement concerning the disposition of tribal money. Following the treaty period, agreements with Indian tribes, ratified by act of Congress served a similar purpose. In recent years various new formulae have made their appearance embodying, in one way or another, the agreement of the tribe and the United States concerning expenditure of tribal funds.

Judgment moneys awarded to the Blackfoot Indians by the Court of Claims have been made "available for disposition by the tribal council of said Indians, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, in accordance with the constitution and bylaws of the Blackfoot Tribe."¹⁰¹ Other statutes provided for the expenditure of tribal funds for objects designated or approved by the tribal council concerned.¹⁰² Perhaps the earliest of such provisions is found in section 3 of the Appropriation Act of February 17, 1879,¹⁰³ providing for the diversion of various appropriations to alternative uses "within the discretion of the President and with the consent of said tribes, expressed in the usual manner."¹⁰⁴ This provision was repeated in subsequent appropriation acts¹⁰⁵ and made permanent by the Act of March 1, 1907.¹⁰⁶

There is an implied agreement between federal and tribal authorities in acts authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to appropriate money for the expenses of tribal councils,¹⁰⁷ tribal delegates,¹⁰⁸ and tribal attorneys.¹⁰⁹

There are, of course, a great number of statutes authorizing the expenditure of tribal funds without express reference to the wishes of the tribe,¹¹⁰ and the problem of federal power to expend tribal funds without Indian consent is dealt with elsewhere.¹¹¹ It may be noted, however, that the omission of express reference to tribal consent in appropriation provisions referring to tribal funds does not necessarily imply the absence of such consent. In fact, many provisions for the appropriation of tribal funds are sought at the request of the tribe concerned, although no reference to this fact appears on the face of the statute.

The present state of the law with respect to the power of an Indian tribe to expend funds or dispose of other personal property held by the United States in trust for the tribe is that any such expenditure must be authorized by act of Congress.¹¹² The situation is analogous to that of a private trust, where the trustee must consent to expenditures by the beneficiary out of the trust fund. In the case of the trust funds of an Indian tribe, the power to determine the propriety of expenditures is vested in Congress, and only in a very few cases has Congress delegated its power of decision to administrative authorities.¹¹³

The history of Indian appropriation legislation shows a continuous struggle between two principles: on the one hand, it is

June 29, 1906, 34 Stat. 547 (Menominee); Act of May 20, 1902, 41 Stat. 1255 (Five Civilized Tribes).

Expenditure from tribal funds for a wide diversity of purposes considered to be usual to the tribe are authorized in a vast number of statutes. See, for example, Act of February 14, 1877, 19 Stat. 221 (Ojibwa).

The trend of various improvements upon tribal lands has been met out of tribal funds, sometimes with a provision that the cost of the improvement shall be repaid to the tribe by the individual Indian benefited. Act of February 21, 1921, sec. 2, 41 Stat. 1105, 1108 (Red Lake Indian Reservation).

Federal appropriations for improvement upon tribal lands have frequently been made reimbursable obligations against future tribal funds or against such funds as might arise from disposal of the lands improved. Act of July 8, 1919, 39 Stat. 379 (Neimatt Indian Reservation); Act of March 1, 1921, sec. 8, 41 Stat. 1355, 1357 (Fort Belknap); Act of February 14, 1923, 12 Stat. 1240 (Paiute); Act of February 9, 1925, 42 Stat. 810 (Chippewa).

Various other statutes authorize payment from tribal funds to individual members of the tribe who have practical claims upon tribal bounty. Act of April 29, 1902, 32 Stat. 177 (Cheyenne Chickasaw); Act of June 1, 1924, 43 Stat. 857 (Red Lake Indians); of Joint Resolution of February 11, 1900, 30 Stat. 609.

Certain tribal funds have been made available for loans to individual members of the tribe. Act of March 4, 1923, 18 Stat. 1391 (Crow); Act of May 17, 1935, 49 Stat. 244 (Crow).

Between 1910 and 1921 a number of statutes were enacted appropriating tribal funds, or federal funds, to be reimbursed out of future tribal funds, for roads, bridges, public schools, and other public improvements. Act of June 20, 1910, 36 Stat. 287 (Ponca); Act of August 21, 1918, 39 Stat. 621 (Spokane); Act of February 20, 1917, 39 Stat. 928 (Navajo); Act of June 7, 1924, 43 Stat. 007 (Navajo); Act of February 26, 1925, 43 Stat. 984 (Navajo).

insisted that Congress, in which is vested constitutional power over appropriations, must retain full control of the subject, and the other hand, it is argued that continually, prudent long-sight in the expenditure of funds, and true economy require the setting aside of tribal funds in definite purposes in a manner that will avoid the risk and delays of reappropriation.⁴²

Actual practice has always been a compromise between these two principles. In section 27 of the Act of May 18, 1916,⁴³ Congress provided:

§ 123 Expenditure from tribal funds without specific appropriations.—No money shall be expended from Indian tribal funds without specific appropriation by Congress except as follows: Repatriation of allotments, education of Indian children in accordance with existing law, per capita and other payments, all of which are hereby continued in full force and effect. Provided further, That this shall not change existing law with reference to the Five Civilized Tribes.

To this list of purposes for which expenditures may be made from tribal funds by administrative authorities without specific congressional appropriation, a specific addition was made by the Act of April 13, 1926,⁴⁴ which declares:

§ 124a Tribal funds, not to purchase insurance for protection of tribal property.—The funds of any tribe of Indians under the control of the United States may be used for payment of insurance premiums for protection of the property of the tribe against fire, theft, tornado, hail, earthquakes, and other elements and forces of nature.

Interior Department appropriation acts usually contain, in addition to specific appropriations out of designated tribal funds for specific purposes, general appropriations of the following form:⁴⁵

Expenses of tribal councils or committees thereof (tribal funds) For traveling and other expenses of members of tribal councils, business committees, or other tribal organizations, when engaged on business of the tribes, including supplies and equipment, not to exceed $5 per diem in lieu of subsistence, and not to exceed five cents per mile for use of personally owned automobiles, and including not more than $25,000 in salary to Washington, District of Columbia, when duly authorized or approved in advance by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, $750,000, payable from funds on deposit to the credit of the particular tribe interested.

Furthermore, as we have already noted, "miscellaneous revenues . . . the result of the labor of any member of such tribe" are deposited in a fund peculiarly named "Indian moneys, proceeds of labor," and are thereafter available for expenditure "in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, for the benefit of the Indian tribes, agencies, and schools on whose behalf they are collected . . . subject to the limitations as to tribal funds imposed by section 27 of the Act of May 18, 1916."⁴⁶

⁴²In other fields of Government the public purpose corporation has been created to facilitate businesslike handling of appropriations, and this same objective was a major factor in the scheme of tribal incorporation established by the Act of June 18, 1934, 48 Stat. 984, 25 U. S. C. 101 et seq.

⁴³49 Stat. 125, 130, 25 U. S. C. § 123 (Supp.) (incomplete in original edition). On the basis of this statute the Comptroller General has held that contracts with attorneys for payment of fees out of tribal funds should not be approved by the Secretary of the Interior in the absence of express statutory authorization. Comptroller's Decisions A 34681, November 8, 1928, A 27730, July 1, 1929, A 29178, May 8, 1930; A 34858, January 20, 1931; A 46001, October 20, 1932, A 81210, December 2, 1936; A 41289, October 11, 1932. The Interior Department takes the position, in view of the Comptroller General's Opinion of June 30, 1937, discussed supra, that these decisions do not apply to funds in the treasury of an organized tribe. Memo Sol I D, January 18, 1938.

In view of the present state of the law, an Indian tribe seeking a particular disposition of "tribal funds" or "trust funds" in the Treasury of the United States, must request a specific congressional appropriation unless "Indian Moneys, Proceeds of Labor" are available or the purpose is one of the four purposes for which Congress has given the Secretary of the Interior permanent spending authority, or the purpose is one to which the current Interior Department appropriation act vests temporary spending authority in that Department. Under any of these three exceptions administrative authority rather than congressional appropriation must be obtained.

These limitations upon the power of an Indian tribe to dispose of funds of other personal property in which it has an equitable interest do not extend to funds of personal property over which the tribe has full legal ownership, even though such funds or property are voluntarily deposited for safekeeping with a local superintendent and therefore technically under the Permanent Appropriation Repeal Act of June 26, 1934,⁴⁷ within the Treasury of the United States. The Act of June 26, 1936,⁴⁸ specifically provides:

"That section 20 of the Permanent Appropriation Repeal Act, approved June 26, 1934 (48 Stat. 1323), shall not be applicable to funds held in trust for individual Indians, associations of individual Indians, or for Indian corporations chartered under the Act of June 18, 1934 (48 Stat. 981).

Since funds so deposited by an incorporated tribe are not subject in congressional appropriation, it would be held a fortiori that funds not so deposited but retained by the tribe are not subject to congressional appropriations. All chiefs issued to incorporated tribes recognize that funds held in the treasury of an incorporated tribe are subject to disposition, in accordance with the limitations of the charter, by the corporation, and are not in any way subject to congressional appropriation. This conclusion may be based upon the narrow ground that section 17 of the Act of June 18, 1934, expressly authorizes a chartered tribe to "dispose of property . . . real and personal," but it seems more satisfactory to place the conclusion upon the broader ground that the various statutes relating to appropriations of "tribal funds" and "trust funds" use these words in a technical sense, as terms of art, to refer to a well-understood category of funds which are held in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the tribe pursuant to some law or treaty, and that, therefore, these limitations are utterly inapplicable to funds in the actual possession of the tribe itself.

This view is in accord with the historic fact that Congress has never presumed to interfere with the expenditure of funds held in tribal treasuries, even when the collection of such funds by tribal authorities is regulated by specific legislation requiring reports to Congress by a tribal treasurer.⁴⁹

The difference between the power of an Indian tribe to dispose of personal property and its power over real property may be summed up in a sentence: A tribe may not validly alienate realty except with the consent of the Federal Government, given by Congress or by an official duly authorized by Congress to consent to particular forms of alienation, on the other hand, a tribe has complete power of disposition over tribal personal property, except in so far as such property has been removed from its control and placed in the possession of the Federal Government pursuant to some law or treaty.

with respect to the disposition of tribal moneys and other personality, we may briefly note:

- (2) Limitations contained in tribal charters⁴⁵

⁴⁴ See, for example, the following, provisions of the constitution and bylaws of the Hopai tribe, approved December 17, 1928:

ART VI Section 1. The Hopai Tribal Council shall have the following powers:

SEC. 4. Treasurer.—The Treasurer shall accept, receive, receipt for, invest, and safeguard all funds in the custody of the Tribal Council. He shall deposit all funds in such depository as the Council shall direct and shall make and preserve a faithful record of such funds and shall report on all receipts and expenditures and the money and nature of all funds in his possession and custody, at such times as requested by the Tribal Council. He shall not pay out or disburse any funds in his possession or custody, except in accordance with a resolution duly passed by the Council. The books and records of the Treasurer shall be audited at least once each year by a competent auditor employed by the Council and it shall on other times as the Council or the Commission of Indian Affairs may direct. The Treasurer shall be required to give a bond satisfactory to the Tribal Council and to the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. Until this Treasurer is bonded the Tribal Council may make such provision for the custody and disbursement of funds as shall guarantee their safety and proper disbursement and use.

(b) To purchase, by gift, bequest, or otherwise, own, hold, manage, operate, and dispose of property of every description, real and personal, subject to the following limitations:

3. No distribution of corporate property to members shall be in debt except out of net income.

(d) To borrow money from the Indian credit fund in accordance with the terms of section 10 of the act of June 18, 1924 (43 Stat. 951), or from any other governmental agency or from any municipal association of members of the tribe, and to use such funds directly for productive tribal enterprises, or to loan money, thus borrowed to individual members or associations of members of the tribe. Provided, That the amount of indebtedness to which the tribe may subject itself shall not exceed $100,000 except with the express approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

(e) To make and perform contracts, and agreements of every description, not inconsistent with law or with any provisions of this charter, with any person, corporation, or corporation, with any municipality or any county or with the United States or the State of Montana, including agreements with the State of Montana for the rendition of public

(4) Limitations contained in tribal trust agreements⁴⁷

The grant of funds to Indian tribes for particular uses, under the Emergency Appropriation Act of April 8, 1917⁴⁸ raised additional questions as to the powers of an Indian tribe in handling funds.

In response to the question put by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs whether an Indian tribe might use the proceeds of rentals of land improved through rehabilitation grants to finance additional construction projects or to meet general tribal expenses or to make per capita payments,⁴⁹ the Solicitor of the Interior Department ruled⁵⁰:

4. When money has been granted to an Indian tribe to be used for a particular purpose, e. g., the development of resources on tribal land or the construction of houses, the Presidential letter above set forth imposes an duty on the tribe when such the money has been properly expended. The fact that such expenditures may increase tribal income from the issuance of leases or permits on tribal land, or tribal income from other enterprises, does not subject a part of that income, or all of it, to any lien on the part of the Federal Government. Such income may, therefore, be received and disbursed by the Indian tribe in any manner not prohibited by Federal law or by the constitution, bylaws, or charter of the tribe unless the tribe has specifically agreed to use such rentals or income for a specific purpose. It is, of course, within the power of a tribe to authorize through its representative council or other officers that certain income available to the tribe shall be used only for designated purposes not inconsistent with law.

Following this determination, the Indian Office entered into trust agreements with various Indian tribes under which the Indian tribe became trustee of the funds granted and the proceeds thereof to the benefit of needy Indians entitled to the benefits of the act in question.⁵¹

Similar, and upholding contracts with the United States of the State of Montana or any agency of either for the development of water-power sites within the reservation. Provided, That all contracts involving payment of money by the corporation in excess of $5,000 in any one fiscal year, involving the development of water-power sites within the reservation shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior as his fully authorized representative.

(c) To produce or assign interests in future tribal income due or to become due to the tribe under any leases, licenses, or other contracts whether or not such leases or contracts are in existence at the time. Provided, That such interests are pledged or assigned shall not exceed more than 10 per cent of the net tribal income in any 1 year, and provided further, That any such agreement shall be subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior or his duly authorized representative.

(d) To deposit surplus funds, from whatever source derived, in any National or State bank, to the extent that such funds are insured by the Federal Deposit Insurance Corporation, or secured by a surety bond, or other security approved by the Secretary of the Interior, or to deposit such funds made in the Federal-Savings bank or a bonded disbursing office of the United States to the credit of the tribe.

SECTION 1. HISTORY OF LEGISLATION

Trade was one of the inevitable activities that arose from contact between Indians and whites, two distinct races, engaged in unlike activities and possessed of different types of goods.

To supervise trade with the Indian tribes, and to discourage individual avarice under conditions which presented unlimited opportunities for corruption and extortion, colonial governments continuously from early pioneer days licensed traders dealing with the Indian tribes¹ and the Congress of the United States, since its first session has frequently been² with respect to Indian trade by virtue of its constitutional authority to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes.³

Provisions with respect to Indian trade were included in many treaties⁴ between the Indian tribes and the United States.

By the Act of July 22, 1790,⁵ the right to license traders was vested in the President or officers approved by him. All unauthorized persons⁶ trading with the Indians were liable to forfeiture of their goods. By this act, Congress adopted the plan of leaving trading wholly to private enterprise and for a few years adhered exclusively to this policy. In 1790, however, the President was authorized to establish governmentally owned and operated trading posts along the far-flung western and southern frontiers or in Indian country within the limits of the United States.⁷

Trade for profit was not contemplated under this act and goods were sold to the Indians at cost. The trader in charge was an agent of the United States, paid by the Government and under oath to refrain directly or indirectly from private business or commercial relations with any Indian or Indian tribe.

In 1822,⁸ however, trading posts were closed. Accounts were rendered, and the system of governmental ownership and operation permanently abandoned. Indian trade again became for the most part private business under governmental supervision and license.

Until 1802 laws with reference to both private trading and Government trading posts were, by their terms, temporary. A permanent act to regulate private trade was enacted on March 30, 1802.⁹

¹The irregularities and improper conduct of the traders received the attention of the Federal Court of the colony of Massachusetts in 1629 (Records of Mass., p. 48). A proclamation of George III set forth the claim of the Crown to regulate trade and licensed traders. (American Archives, 4th Series, 1774-1775, vol. I, Col. 174). On congressional power over trade, see Chapter 3, sec. 3.

⁵1 Stat. 137. By the provisions of this statute, any proper person could obtain a license for 2 years to trade with the Indians upon giving bond for faithful observance of governmental regulations. The Act of March 1, 1793, 1 Stat. 429, was a statute similar in its provisions with an additional prohibition against purchase of horses in Indian country without a special license.

The Act of May 19, 1804, 1 Stat. 400, declared, according to existing practice, "Indian country" where trading licenses were required. In subsequent definitions see Chapter 1, sec. 8.

⁶A provision relative to requiring licenses to trade with Indians was considered as interfering with a treaty of amity, commerce, and navigation between Great Britain and the United States, dated November 19, 1794, 8 Stat. 118. A Presidential proclamation of February 20, 1790, declared that trade regulations were not applicable to British subjects

The Act of April 18, 1790, 1 Stat. 132, after two or three rejections, was enacted upon the insistence of President Washington. The congressional debates on this statute reveal a blending of benevolent desire to protect the Indians from the cupidity and venous avarice of more commercially experienced whites and Yankee shrewdness, anxious to prevent British and Canadian interests from reaping increasing profits from lucrative Indian trade. Furthermore, the vast outlay of capital required to establish even a portion of the needed posts, presented too large a venture for private capital. This statute³⁰ made it unlawful for any citizen or other person to reside in Indian towns or hunting camps as a trader or to carry on commercial intercourse with Indians without a license. Suitable trading sites, it was later provided, were to be designated by Indian agents.³¹

On June 30, 1834 (Congress passed an Act revising and repealing the former legislation on the subject and particularly defining the term "Indian country" for the purposes of that act).³²

Congress has not seen fit to regulate Indian traders outside of "Indian country." By the Act of August 15, 1876,³³ the Com-

concerning trade with Indian Affairs was vested with sole authority to license traders to the Indian tribes and to make requisite rules and regulations. SECTION 2. PRESENT LAW

At the present time the Commissioner of Indian Affairs continues to exercise sole power and authority in the appointment of traders in the Indian tribes.⁴⁰ Under existing regulations,⁴¹ any person who proposes in the satisfaction of the Commissioner that he is a proper person may secure a trader's license.⁴² Ordinarily the Commissioner will not issue a license without the approval of the tribal council. Bond with approved sureties⁴³ must accompany the application.⁴⁴ Any person other than an Indian of full blood,⁴⁵ who attempts to reside in the Indian country on any Indian reservation as a trader without a license, or to introduce goods or trade therein, forfeits all merchandise offered for sale to the Indians or found in his possession and is liable to a penalty of $300. Licenses are granted for 1 year,⁴⁶ and, at the end of that time the Commissioner is satisfied that all rules and regulations have been observed, a new license may be issued.⁴⁷ Introduction of liquor into the Indian country is a statutory ground for the revocation of a trader's license.⁴⁸

In order to prevent the acquisition of a share of the trade without approval of the Indian Service, Congress established the present rule that no appointed Indian trader could sell, share, or convey, in whole or in part, his right to trade with the Indians.⁴⁹ A sale of a license, being void, has been held not to

⁴⁰ Regulations Governing Traders of Indian Tribes, 25 C. F. R. at 278. Regulations Governing Traders on Navajo, Zuni, and Hopi Reservations, ibid., pl. 277.

⁴⁴ Sections 261 and 262 of title 25, United States Code, giving the Commissioner of Indian Affairs authority to regulate trade with Indians, and requiring any person desiring to trade with the Indians on any Indian reservation to do so under the regulations of the Commissioner, are general in scope and would include the Indians themselves. Section 264 of title 25 excludes from the enforcement provisions Indians of the full blood. Section 264 of the full blood, who attempts to reside in the Indian country on any Indian reservation as a trader without a license, or to introduce goods or trade therein, forfeits all merchandise offered for sale to the Indians or found in his possession and is liable to a penalty of $300. Licenses are granted for 1 year, and, at the end of that time the Commissioner is satisfied that all rules and regulations have been observed, a new license may be issued. Introduction of liquor into the Indian country is a statutory ground for the revocation of a trader's license.

⁴⁸ Under the special regulations for the Navajo, Hopi, and Zuni Reservations, a 3-year term is allowed. See 20 U. S. C. 276.11-277.11.

constitute consideration for a sale.¹ A contract by a holder of a trading license to pay a third person a portion of the proceeds of the trade, in consideration of the third person actually running the business, was considered by the courts as simoniac, a subterfuge, violating the spirit and intent of the trading statutes.² The court, however, approved an arrangement whereby a licensed trader formed a partnership and the nonlicensed member of the partnership secured a permit to live on the reservation, to sell to the Indians and to share in the profits.³

While the general policy is to encourage resident ownership of Indian trading posts, in some instances the lack of local capital necessitates absentee ownership. At the present time, as a matter of actual practice, a license may be held by a resident manager instead of by a nonresident owner.⁴

To insure integrity of conduct on the part of persons employed in the Indian Service and to protect the Indians, no license is issued to any person employed in Indian affairs by the United States.⁵

A license to trade is not required in Alaska. The Act of June 30, 1834,⁶ was not extended, ex proprio vigore, to that Territory upon its cession to the United States.⁷

The court, in United States v. Scheuch,⁸ in 1852, decided that this new possession was not Indian country, as defined and limited by the Trade and Intercourse Act. After this decision, on March 8, 1874,⁹ Congress extended to Alaska the provisions of sections 21 and 22 of this statute relating principally to the interdiction of liquor traffic. The presumption seems clear that by singling out, mentioning, and extending two sections only, the intention of Congress was to withhold or exclude from the Territory all other sections of the Act. Apparently Alaska was intended to be considered "Indian country," in connection with Indian trade only to the extent of that specifically prohibited trade.

By the regulations of the Department of the Interior, products sold to the Indians are required to be good and merchantable, and the prices must be fair and reasonable.¹⁰ The President, whenever in his opinion public interest requires, is authorized to prohibit the introduction of goods, in any particular article, into the country of any tribe.

For many years the sale to the Indians of means of warfare has been restricted and regulated.¹¹ At the present time the Secretary of the Interior may adopt such rules as may be necessary to prohibit the sale of arms and ammunition in any district occupied by uncivilized or hostile Indians.¹² Arms and ammunition may not be sold to the Indians by traders except upon permission of a superintendent of an Indian agency who has clearly established that the weapons are for a lawful purpose.¹³

Congress has provided that no person other than an Indian may, within Indian country, purchase or receive of an Indian in the way of barter, trade, or pledge a gun, trap, or other article commonly used in hunting, any instrument of husbandry or cooking utensil of the kind commonly obtained by Indians in their intercourse with whites, or any article of clothing, except skins or furs.¹⁴

It is against the rules laid down by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to sell tobacco, cigars, and cigarettes to minor Indians under 18 years of age.¹⁵ Likewise, liquor traffic is suppressed.¹⁶

Sale of speckled harmful drugs is illegal.¹⁷ Gambling is prohibited in trading posts.¹⁸ Trading on Sunday presents sufficient cause for revocation of a license.¹⁹

At the present time credit is given at the trader's risk.²⁰ Traders may not accept loans or pledges of personal property to Indians to obtain credit or loans, and Indians may not be paid in state orders, in tokens, or in any other way than in money.²¹

To protect the Indians, traders are forbidden to buy, trade for, or have in their possession any munition or other goods which have been purchased or furnished by the Government for the use or welfare of the Indians.²² The business of a trader must be conducted on premises specified in the license.²³ Tribal or individual lands used by traders must be leased in the usual manner.²⁴

No trader will be allowed to sublet or rent buildings which he occupies without the approval of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs,²⁵ and, where the tribe is organized, without the consent of the tribal council.

The personal property, including the stock in trade of a licensed trader, is ordinarily subject to state taxation, although the privilege of doing business with Indians would appear to be exempt from state taxation.²⁶ As an Indian trader was not an officer of the Government, and as his goods are his own private property, which he may sell indiscriminately to Indians or non-Indians, a state tax on the personal property of a licensed trader is not a tax on an agency of the Federal Government, or an interference with the regulation of commerce with the Indian tribes.²⁷

Treaties with various tribes bear ample evidence of the gross traders acquired by exchange of credit to their customers. A large portion of the money from the sale of ceded land passed directly to the trader for debts, and these debts in several instances necessitated cessations of land. See Chapter 8, sec. 7C.

SECTION 1. HISTORICAL BACKGROUND

Proscriptions on traffic in liquor among the Indians began in early colonial times, in a few of the colonies.¹ The Indians themselves at various times sought to curb their consumption of "strong drink," and it is worthy of note that the first federal control measure² was enacted, at least in part, in response to the verbal plea of an Indian chief to President Thomas Jefferson on January 4, 1802.³

On January 28, 1802, President Jefferson called upon Congress to take some step to control the liquor traffic with the Indians in the following language:

These people [the Indians] are becoming very sensible of the baneful effects produced on their morals, their health, and existence, by the abuse of ardent spirit: and ³ Act of March 30, 1802, sec. 21, 2 Stat. 139.

⁴ In the course of his talk to the President, the Indian chief, Little Turtle, among other things, said:

"... But farther, nothing can be done to advance unless the great council of the Sixteen Fires, now assembled, will prohibit any person from selling any spirituous liquors among their red children."

Farther: Your children are not wanting in industry, but it is the introduction of this fatal poison which keeps them poor. Your children have not that common evil, themselves, which you have, therefore, before anything can be done to advantage, this evil must be remedied.

Farther: When our white brethren came to this land, our forefathers were numerous and happy, but, since their intercourse with the white people, and owing to the introduction of the fatal poison, we have become less numerous and happy. (American State Papers, vol. 7 (Indian Affairs, class II, vol. I) (1789-1815) p. 665.)

SECTION 2. SOURCES AND SCOPE OF FEDERAL POWER RE LIQUOR TRAFFIC

The power of the Federal Government over traffic in intoxicating liquors with the Indians may be said to be derived from "several sources." Among these may be mentioned, first, the

¹ In United States v. Ferguson, 191 Fed. 878 (C. C. 8, 1911), rev'd 180 Fed. 1008 (D. C. W. D. Ark. 1910), the power is said to be derived from five sources, as follows:

First, the treaty-making power. Second, the power to regulate interstate commerce. Third, the power to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes. Fourth, the ownership, as sovereign, of lands to which the Indian title has not been extinguished. Fifth, the plenary authority arising out of the guardianship of the Indians as an alien but dependent people. (At p. 874.)

some of them earnestly desire a prohibition of that article from being carried among them. The Legislature will consider whether the effectuating that desire would not be in the spirit of benevolence and liberality, which they have hitherto professed toward these, our neighbors, and which has had so happy an effect towards continuing their friendship. It has been found, too, in experience, that the same abuse gives frequent rise to incidents tending much to commit our peace with the Indians."

Congress forthwith adopted legislation which authorized the President of the United States "to take such measures, from time to time, as to him may appear expedient to prevent or restrain the vending or distributing of spirituous liquors among all or any of the said Indian tribes, anything herein contained to the contrary thereof notwithstanding."

With control over treaty-making, the licensing of traders, and the management of Government trading houses, the Executive had ample power to control the situation without a general Indian prohibition law, and 80 years passed before such a law was enacted.⁴

The considerations of benefit to the Indians and protection to the whites thus suggested in Jefferson's message have since continued to influence the deliberations of Congress in its efforts to suppress the traffic in liquor with the Indians.⁵

Modier, Chief Special Officer of the Office of Indian Affairs, March 28, 1908. The contention that practically every Indian was since the discovery of America has been caused directly or indirectly, by the liquor traffic is put forward by William E. itory and other property of the United States," second, the clause in the Constitution relative to the making of treaties,⁴¹ and third, the recognized relation of tribal Indians to the United States.⁴² The first, of course relates to the powers of Congress, the second to those of the treaty-making department, and the third the broadest and most important of all, refers to the powers of both.

The treaty-making power has been exercised, in conjunction with the congressional power to carry out the terms of treaties, by legislative enactments, to impose prohibitions against the liquor traffic by direct treaties with the Indians, as was done, for example, in the Treaty of October 2, 1863,⁴³ with the Chippewas, and by the Convention with Russia of April 5, 1824.⁴⁴ Treaties and legislative enactments of the United States are of equal dignity, so that the restrictions against intoxicants in the former have the force of law.⁴⁵ Similar in effect to treaties with the Indian tribes are "agreements," which were resorted to after the policy of dealing with the Indians in treaty was abandoned.⁴⁶ These agreements, however, received their legal force from acts of Congress ratifying and adopting them. They are exemplified by the agreements with the Nez Percé Indians and the Yankton Sioux.⁴⁷

The power to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes is really the constitutional backbone of federal legislation against traffic in liquor with the Indians. The courts have upheld this power with respect to tribal Indians, and the Indian country.⁴⁸

The power over commerce with the Indians is distinct from that over interstate commerce in that traffic with the Indian tribes and may be regulated regardless of state lines. Thus, the Indian commerce power covers traffic which may be wholly within one state.⁵⁰

It is to be noted that regulation under this power is not limited to transactions in which a tribe acts as an entity but extends to transactions with individual members of such tribe.⁵¹ The Supreme Court has stated this principle in the following terms:

Commerce with foreign nations, without doubt means commerce between citizens of the United States and citizens or subjects of foreign governments, as individuals. And so commerce with the Indian tribes means commerce with the individuals composing those tribes.⁵²

In connection with the power to regulate commerce with the Indian tribes there exists also the authority granted by the Constitution to do all things necessary and proper by way of carrying out its provisions.⁵³ Pursuant to this power and the power over the territory and other property belonging to the United States,⁵⁴ the Federal Government has imposed liquor restrictions on lands ceded to it by the Indians when these lands adjoined Indian country.⁵⁵ The purpose of this measure was to prevent sale of liquor on the boundaries of the land returned to the Indians. Except for these extensions of the Indian liquor laws to "buffer" areas the states would have had the exclusive police power thereon. Such extensions have been repeatedly upheld by the United States Supreme Court.⁵⁶ The power lasts only so long as Indians are present on the retained reservation lands and certain wards of the Government.⁵⁷ In 1933, Congress withdrew liquor restrictions from the "buffer" lands.⁵⁸

Congress may also enact such measures to aid in the enforcement of the prohibition statutes, as are "directed at the means and methods used in the accomplishing of the violation of the

SECTION 3. EXISTING PROHIBITIONS AND ENFORCEMENT MEASURES

Pursuant to the foregoing federal powers, Congress has evolved a system of prohibition and enforcement measures against trade in liquor with the Indians, and in the Indian country.²³

The most important of these measures is the Act of July 23, 1920,²⁴ as amended in 1938 to read as follows:²⁵

Any person who shall sell, give away, dispose of, exchange, or barter any malt, spirituous, vinous, liquor, including beer, ale, and wine, or any alcohol or other intoxicating liquor of any kind whatsoever, or any essence, extract, butters, preparation, compound, composition, or any article whatsoever, under any name, label, or brand, which produces intoxication to any Indian to whom an allotment of land has been made while the title to the same shall be held in trust by the Government, or to any Indian who is a ward of the Government under charge of any Indian superintendent or agent, or to any Indian, including mixed bloods, to whom the Government, through its departments, exercises guardianship, and any person who shall introduce in attempt to introduce any malt, spirituous, or vinous liquor including beer, ale, and wine, or any alcohol or intoxicant or compound or composition into the Indian country which term shall include any Indian allotment while the title to the same shall be held in trust in the Government, or while the same shall remain inalienable by the allottee without the consent of the United States, shall be punished for the first offense by imprisonment for not more than one year, and by a fine of not more than $500, and for the second offense and each offense thereafter by imprisonment for not more than five years, and by a fine of not more than $2,000. Provided, however, That the person convicted shall be committed until fine and costs are paid. And provided further, That first offenses under this section may be prosecuted by information, but no person convicted of a first offense under this section shall be sentenced to imprisonment or be committed to a reformatory or to perform hard labor. It shall be a sufficient defense to any charge of introducing or attempting to introduce ardent spirits, ale, beer, wine, or intoxicating liquors into the Indian country that the acts charged were done under authority, in writing, from the War Department or any other duly authorized department by the War Department. All complaints for the arrest of any person or persons made for violation of any of the provisions of this section shall be made in the county where the offense shall have been committed, or it committed upon or within any reservation not included in any county, then in any county adjoining such reservation, but in all cases such arrests shall be made before any United States court commissioner residing in such adjoining county, or before any magistrate or judicial officer authorized by the laws of the State in which such reservation is located to issue warrants for the arrest and examination of offenders by section 1014 of the Revised Statutes [§ 1178 (C. C. 601)] as amended. And all persons so arrested shall, unless discharged upon examination, be held to answer and stand trial before the court of the United States having jurisdiction of the offense.²⁶

This statute defines two distinct prohibitions. The first is directed against any disposition of intoxicants to any Indian who has an allotment, title to which is restricted or held in trust by the Federal Government, or to any Indian who is a ward or under the guardianship of the United States.²⁷ The Indians included may be located in Indian country or outside of it.²⁸ Indians as well as whites and others may commit this crime,²⁹ but apparently an Indian purchasing or otherwise receiving illicit liquor is not offending against this law.³⁰

The person disposing of liquor to an Indian allottee or ward is not excused because he did not know the recipient was an

The Act of March 15, 1904, c. 13, 33 Stat. 297 added the words "in any allotment giving title to said person concurrently with the direct costs."

As the substance of this law was carried in the R. S. § 4219, Indians in the Indian country were excepted from its penalties. This excepted was taken out by the Act of February 27, 1917, 16 Stat. 210, 211 which was an act to correct errors in the Revised Statutes.

The words "ale, beer, wine, or intoxicating liquors of any kind" were added by the Act of July 23, 1920, 27 Stat. 200. This broadening was made necessary by decisions holding beer not to be within the earlier definition. See Ames v. United States, 162 U. S. 670 (1895), In re McGonough, 40 Fed. 869 (D. C. Mont., 1902).

Again, by the Act of February 30, 1907, 29 Stat. 505, the collection of liquor was extended to read as in the 1938 amendment above.

The acts of 1903 and 1907 were read together by Reid v. United States, 5 F. 2d 177 (C. C. 8, 1925); Morgan v. United States, 698 (C. C. 8, 1916), and United States v. Hildner, 112 Fed. 698 (C. C. 8, 1916), and United States v. Hildner, 112 Fed. 698 (C. C. 8, 1916), and United States v. Hildner, 112 Fed. 698 (C. C. 8, 1916).

The actions at the 1938 amendment which are now the primary provisions and the provisions allowing prosecution by information for the first offense.

²⁶ Wardship of the Indians and termination of wardship is discussed in sec. 9 of Chapter 8. It may be noted here, however, that the granting of citizenship did not take away Indians out of the working of the liquor laws. United States v. Hildner, 112 Fed. 698 (C. ²⁴ For a definition of "Indian country" see Chapter 1, sec. 8. For the purpose of the liquor laws it means all lands and reservations, Indian title to which has not been extinguished. The leading cases are applicable to this definition are United States v. De Bra, 121 U. S. 276 (1887), Beas v. Clark, 88 U. S. 204 (1874). ²⁶ Act of June 15, 1938, 52 Stat. 696, 25 U. S. C. 241. This act apparently repealed similar provisions in the Act of January 30, 1907, 29 Stat. 506.

Indian or a "ward of the Government," or because he introduced him for a Mexican or white."¹⁰

The second prohibition defined in the statute is directed against the introduction or attempt to introduce any intoxicants into Indian country.¹¹ "To offend against the ban on introducing liquor it is enough that one is the means of carrying the liquor within the limits of Indian country knowing of its presence and transportation."¹² The person so introducing alcohol need not have any interest in it.¹³ Nor need he have any intent to introduce, that is, he need not know that he has entered Indian country.¹⁴ But an intent is necessary to constitute the crime of attempting to introduce liquor into Indian country.¹⁵ In both the introduction and the attempt to introduce, the destination, intentionally or unwittingly, must be the Indian country. The mere transportation through Indian country is not within this act when the destination is beyond.¹⁶

As the courts repeatedly held that possession of liquor in Indian country was not alone sufficient to show introduction,¹⁷ Congress in 1916 enacted the following law to bolster this weak spot:

"... possession by a person of intoxicating liquors in the country where the introduction is prohibited by treaty or Federal statute shall be prima facie evidence of unlawful introduction."¹⁸

In 1918, as an addition and to enforcement, Congress provided that possession in Indian country shall be an independent offense.¹⁹ "The statute reads:

"... possession by a person of intoxicating liquors in the Indian country where the introduction is or was prohibited by treaty or Federal statute shall be an offense and punished in accordance with the provisions of the Acts of July twenty-third, eighteen hundred and ninety-two (Twenty-seventh Statutes at Large, page two hundred and sixty), and January thirtieth, eighteen hundred and ninety-seven (Twenty-ninth Statutes at Large, page five hundred and six)."²⁰

The elements of this offense are possession, which means physical control and power to dispose of liquor, knowledge of possession,²¹ and location of the liquor within the limits of Indian country.²² Apparently, knowledge of possession in another is not enough, nor is drinking from the bottle of another enough.²³ But where the accused is found with a full liquor bottle which he breaks, it has been held that these facts are evidence of possession, knowledge, and control.²⁴ The wording of this statute, though not as detailed in defining prohibited liquors as the Act of June 13, 1938,²⁵ is apparently as broad, since it covers any intoxicant.²⁶

The early Trade and Intercourse Act of 1834 contained a measure to facilitate enforcement of the liquor prohibitions, which is still in force. It provided:

"That if any person whatever shall, within the limits of the Indian country, set up or continue any distillery for manufacturing and selling spirits, wines, and other intoxicating liquors named in the Act of January thirtieth, eighteen hundred and ninety-seven (Twenty-ninth Statutes at Large, page five hundred and six),²⁷ he shall forfeit and pay a penalty of one thousand dollars, and it shall be the duty of the superintendent of Indian affairs, Indian agent, or sub-agent, within the limits of whose agency the same shall be set up or continued, forthwith to destroy and break up the same."²⁸

Other enforcing acts, including provisions for search, seizure, and forfeiture of goods and vehicles, have been enacted from time to time as conditions required. This legislation also had its inception in the Trade and Intercourse Acts of May 6, 1822,²⁹ and of June 30, 1834,³⁰ and then modified provisions are as follows:

Sec. 2140 "If any superintendent of Indian affairs, Indian agent, or sub-agent, or commanding officer of a military post, for reason of suspect or is informed that any white person or Indian is about to introduce or has introduced any spirituous liquor or wine (bees and other intoxicating liquor named in the Act of January thirtieth, eighteen hundred and ninety-seven (Twenty-ninth Statutes at Large, page five hundred and six))³¹ into the Indian country in violation of law, such superintendent, agent, sub-agent, or commanding officer, may cause the beads, stores, packages, wagons, sleds, and places of deposit of such person to be searched, and if any such liquor is found thereon, the same, together with the beads, furs, wampum, and sleds used in carrying the same, and also the goods, packages, and peltries of such person, shall be seized and delivered to the proper officer, and shall be proceeded against, by libel in the proper court, and forfeited, one-half to the informer and the other half to the use of the United States, and if such person be a trader, his license shall be revoked and his bond put in suit. It shall moreover be the duty of any person in the service of the United States, or of any Indian, to take and destroy any and all spirits or wine found in the Indian country, except such as may be introduced thereon by the War Department. In all cases arising under this and the preceding sections [27 Stat. 611, 260 and 261 Stat. 800, as amended by 32 Stat. 801], Indians shall be competent witnesses."³²

Under this statute federal enforcement officers have the right to search and seize the beads, stores, packages, wagons, etc., without warrant. But federal officers may not make unreasonable searches as they are subject to the Fourth Amendment to the United States Constitution. And the Act of August 27,

1935,⁴⁵ imposes criminal liability for unreasonable search of dwellings without a warrant. In case of such unreasonable search the officer, civil or military, also becomes civilly liable.⁴⁶ The early decision of the United States Supreme Court in Indian Pa. Co. v. United States,⁴⁷ determined that this act gave authority to search and seize only in Indian country.⁴⁸ As to what might be seized and subject to civil action there was some doubt. The courts decided that the goods forfeited should be only those which were the property of the offender, and forfeited only to the extent of his interest.⁴⁹ When the automobile became perfected and widely used, it began to play an important role in the illicit liquor trade. The Government sought to subject it to civil proceedings under the foregoing statute. The courts determined that automobiles were not known to the legislators who passed the law in 1834, and that automobiles did not fit into the enumeration of wagons, boats, and sleds.⁵⁰ Congress quickly remedied this defect by the Act of March 2, 1917, which provided:

"That automobiles or any other vehicles or conveyances used in introducing, or attempting to introduce, intoxicants into the Indian country, or where the introduction is prohibited by treaty or Federal statute, whether used by the owner thereof or other person, shall be subject to the seizure, libel, and forfeiture provided in section twenty-two hundred and forty of the Revised Statutes of the United States.⁵¹

This act is broader than the search and seizure provision in the Act of 1834 in those respects: (1) Search and seizure may be made outside Indian country when the vehicle taken is used in the attempt to introduce liquor into Indian country; (2) automobiles and any other vehicles are included; (3) "the thing involved [automobile or other vehicle], and not its owner is the offender"; (4) "The vehicle is forfeited without regard to ownership." Finally, it should be noted that these enforcement measures apply solely to Indian liquor laws and cannot be used as a basis for search, seizure, and libel of goods, vehicles, etc., used in any other illicit traffic.⁵²

The passage of the Eighteenth Amendment, the National Prohibition Act, and repeal of both had no effect to supplant or repeal any of the special Indian liquor laws.⁵³

SECTION 4. LOCALITY WHERE THESE MEASURES APPLY

The statutes examined above comprise the existing prohibitions and enforcement measures concerning the Indian liquor traffic. But the picture is not complete without an understanding of the locality where these measures apply. Recent statutes have made this fully clear with regard to lands within the United States proper. First, the Act of June 27, 1934, provides:

"That hereafter the special Indian liquor laws shall not apply to former Indian lands now outside of any existing Indian reservation in any case where the land is no longer held by Indians under trust patents or under any other form of deed or patent which contains restrictions against alienation without the consent of some official of the United States Government. Provided, however, That nothing in this Act shall be construed to discontinue or repeal the provisions of the Indian liquor laws which prohibit the sale, gift, barter, exchange, or other disposition of beer, wine, and other liquors to Indians of the classes set forth in the Act of January 30, 1907 (39 Stat. L. 508), and section 241, title 25, of the United States Code."

The purpose of this act is to repeal old treaty and statutory provisions whereby lands ceded to the United States, but adjoining Indian lands retained, were subjected to the Indian liquor laws.⁵⁴

Second, ordinarily fee patented, unreserved lands are not subject to the liquor laws. Congress has sometimes continued the Indian liquor laws in such lands.⁵⁵

Third, the Act of March 2, 1917, brought Osage County, Oklahoma, within the Indian liquor laws.⁵⁶

Fourth, by the Act of March 5, 1934⁵⁷ that part of Oklahoma, formerly known as "Indian Territory," in which all liquor traffic was forbidden by the Act of March 1, 1895,⁵⁸ was released from the restrictions of the Indian liquor laws except as to lands on which Indian schools are or may be located. Reservation lands, allotted lands under restrictions as covered by trust patents outside of Indian reservations, and Osage County, in Oklahoma, remain as Indian country in the enforcement of liquor laws.

An interesting question arises with regard to reservation lands newly purchased and set aside for the Indians. Are these lands subject to the Indian liquor laws? This question has been decisively settled in the affirmative in the recent opinion of the United States Supreme Court in United States v. M'Clintock.⁵⁹

⁵⁶ See for example Act of June 4, 1920, sec. 6, 41 Stat. 751, 754 ("New Reservation").

Only two statutory exceptions exist to the prohibitions against liquor in Indian country. The first relates to the use of sacramental wine, as follows:

"...it shall not be unlawful to introduce and use wines solely for sacramental purposes, under church authority, at any place within the Indian country or any Indian reservation, including the Pueblo Reservations in New Mexico."

The second exception permits liquor for lawful purposes in Oregon County, Oklahoma.³¹

Perhaps still another exception may be found in the provisions of the Act of June 16, 1938,³² making "32 beer" a matter of local option in Oklahoma.

Alaska is not covered by the Indian liquor laws. Congress has always legislated specially for that territory with regard ³³ 48 Stat. 311, c. 102.

to liquor and has granted the power to control the liquor traffic to the Territorial Legislature by the Act of April 13, 1901.³⁴

Indian country and that the special Indian liquor laws did not extend to the new territory. In the following year, Congress extended the Indian liquor laws to Alaska by the Act of March 4, 1897, 37 Stat. 610, 686. Again by the Act of May 27, 1891, 25 Stat. 21, Congress prohibited importation, manufacture, and sale of intoxicants to all of Alaska and its inhabitants. This law was amended by the Act of March 3, 1899, sec. 112, 30 Stat. 1258, 1271, to limit the prohibition to selling to Indians.

As amended by the Act of February 6, 1909, 35 Stat. 600, 604, the Act of 1899 remains in force. In answer to the question of the Secretary of the Interior as to whether the Indian liquor laws applied to Alaska the Acting Solicitor of the Department of the Interior in 1907 gave his opinion that they do not. His opinion reached the following conclusion:

"It is evident, therefore, that Congress did not intend those provisions [i. e., the Indian liquor laws] as having application to the natives of Alaska, otherwise, the enactment of Section 112 above [10 Stat. 1271] would not have been necessary. That the territorial legislature contained a like provision is shown by the fact that it has also seen fit to deal specially with the subject of liquor control among the Alaska natives. (See section 1961, Comp. Cons. Laws of Alaska, 1913.) In any event, the enactment by Congress of a special liquor law for the natives of Alaska makes the general enactment found in Section 21 [27 U. S. C. 21] locally inapplicable."

SECTION 5. ENFORCEMENT AGENCIES, JURISDICTION, AND PROCEDURE

The work of the Office of Indian Affairs in the field of prohibition enforcement was thus described by the Supreme Court, per Hughes, J., in the case of United States v. Budzill:³⁵

"...From an early day, Congress has prohibited the liquor traffic among the Indians, and it has been one of the important duties of the Indian Office and in the enforcement of this legislation. (See Act of June 30, 1894, c. 101, sec. 20, 4 Stat. 720, 722; Rev. Stat., sec. 2139, 2140, 2141, Act of July 24, 1892, c. 274, 27 Stat. 260, Act of January 20, 1897, c. 101, 29 Stat. 600.) It has furnished such aid by the detection of violations, by the collection of evidence, and by appropriate steps to secure the conviction and punishment of offenders. The regulations of the office, adopted under statutory authority (Rev. Stat., sec. 465, 2058), have been explicit as to the duties of Indian agents in this respect. In recent years Congress has made special appropriations "to enable the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, to take action to suppress the traffic of intoxicating liquors among Indians." (34 Stat. 928, 1037, 86 Stat. 74, 782, 86 Stat. 274, 1061, 87 Stat. 819), and an organization of special officers and deputies, serving in various states, has been created in the department. Through these efforts numerous convictions have been obtained. The results have been reported in Congress annually by the Commissioner and the appropriations for the continuance of this service have been increased."

² The nature and extent of this authorized service of the department are shown by the following extract from the Commissioner's report for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1912: "Until 1906

"...enforcement of these statutes and subsequent enactments" (as to the liquor traffic) was left to Indian agents and superintendents and then Indian police, awarded as they might be by local police officers and by representatives of the Department of Justice. In 1906 criminal clerks in Indian Territory became so crowded and the possibility of early flight so remote that dismissal of the statutes prohibiting importation of intoxicants assumed large importance. To meet the emergency Congress, in the Act of June 25, 1906, appropriated $25,000 to be used to suppress the traffic in intoxicating liquors among Indians, and in August 1906, a special office was commissioned and sent to Oklahoma, that he and his subordinates might, through detective operations, supplement the efforts of superintendents in charge of reservations. In the fiscal year 1909, when the appropriation had grown to $10,000, this service began to operate throughout all States where Indians were prohibited. In 1911 the service had grown until it had an appropriation of $70,000 and an organization including 1 chief special officer, 1 assistant chief, 2 constables, 32 special officers, and 111 local deputies stationed in 21 States. The increasing success of the service appears in the fact that in 1906, 561 cases were when the service started came to rest in court, resulting in 516 convictions, whereas in 1911, 1,302 cases came to court, 1,108 defendants were convicted, and but 84 defendants were acquitted by juries. In 1911 fines imposed amounted to $46,163, or more than the appropriation for the service." 11 Dec. No. 928, 62d Cong., 2d sess., pp. 11, 12.

In the Act of March 1, 1907,³⁶ Congress empowered special officers to search and seize, and in 1912 gave them the powers of the United States marshals and deputy marshals.³⁷

Criminal or libel proceedings are cognizable in the Federal District Court in the district where the offense was committed.³⁸ The manner of complaint and arrest is governed by the Act of June 15, 1893, set out in full in section 3 of this chapter.

SECTION 1. INTRODUCTION

Criminal introduction¹ in Indian law involves an allocation of authority among federal, tribal, and state courts. This allocation of authority depends in general upon three factors: subject matter, locus, and person.

Jurisdiction of the federal courts must be based, in every instance, upon some applicable statute, since there is no federal common law of crimes. From the standpoint of areas of application, the federal criminal statutes relating to Indian affairs are of three types:

- (a) Those that apply regardless of the locus of the offense, such as the crime of selling liquor to an Indian.²
- (b) Those that apply within areas under the exclusive jurisdiction of the Federal Government, such as the offense of receiving stolen goods,³ and

(c) Offenses punishable only when committed within the "Indian country" or within "an Indian reservation," such as, for example, the offense of possessing intoxicating liquors in the Indian country.⁴

The jurisdiction of tribal courts depends also upon the factors of subject matter, locus, and person, and the same may be said of state court jurisdiction. Since this study is primarily devoted to federal Indian law, only incidental attention will be paid to tribal and state penal laws relating to Indian affairs. Limitations upon the application of such laws contained in federal statutes will, however, be examined.

SECTION 2. CRIMES IN INDIAN COUNTRY

Since there is a considerable body of federal legislation punishing various acts committed on Indian reservations or within Indian country, the question may be raised in any case involving such legislation whether the offense charged was in fact committed within an Indian reservation or in the Indian country. The definition of these terms has been considered elsewhere.⁵ For present purposes it is enough to summarize general conclusions which are elsewhere noted.

- (1) Tribal land is considered Indian country for purposes of federal criminal jurisdiction.⁶
- (2) An allotment held under patent in fee and subject to restraint against alienation is likewise considered Indian country for purposes of federal criminal jurisdiction.⁷
- (3) An allotment held under trust patent, with title in the Government, is likewise considered Indian country during the trust period.⁸

(4) Rights-of-way across an Indian reservation are considered "Indian country" for some or all purposes of federal criminal jurisdiction.⁹

⁵ The Act of June 28, 1932, 47 Stat. 330, amended sec. 418 of title 18 of the United States Code, which originally applied "within the limits of any Indian reservation" so as to apply "on and within any Indian reservation under the jurisdiction of the United States Government, including rights of way running through the reservation."

Interpreting this phrase, the Solicitor of the Interior Department declared:

"It is my opinion that the amendment should be given its apparent and natural meaning, namely, that the specific reference to rights-of-way was intended to provide for federal jurisdiction over all rights-of-way running through any Indian reservation. This is advanced as the proper position for this Department to take in view of the following considerations: 1. The probable federal constitution of the amendment would be that the amendment was intended to include within Federal jurisdiction all rights-of-way because at the previous division of jurisdiction over rights-of-way in Indian reservations. Prior to the passage of the amendment the courts had concluded that rights-of-way to which the Indian title had not been extinguished remained part of the reservation and within Federal jurisdiction, whereas other rights-of-way to which such title had been extinguished was subject to state jurisdiction. A court would presume that in view of this state of the law any amendment referring to rights-of-way generally would be intended to provide a uniform rule. If only a statement of existing law had been intended, the reference in the amendment would rather have been to rights-of-way to which the Indian title had not been extinguished, or no mention of the subject would have been made at all.

Moreover, it would be presumed by a court that this Depart-

(5) It is questionable whether land held by an Indian under a fee patent without restriction is Indian country for purposes of federal criminal jurisdiction, the weight of authority is that the land is not "Indian country" within the meaning of federal penal statutes.²⁰

The territorial limits of the jurisdiction of infant courts and courts of Indian offences¹¹ have not been considered in detail in any reported case. The following discussion is taken from an administrative ruling by the Solicitor for the Interior Department dealing with the question.¹²

May an Indian court exercise jurisdiction over acts committed by Indians on unresurveyed lands within an Indian reservation, where the Indians concerned are properly before the court?

Questions of court "jurisdiction" frequently turn on open analysis to be a confused mixture of questions dealing with international law, constitutional law, statutory construction and common law principles. It is important, therefore, that we define the question that concerns us as clearly and realistically as possible. In asking whether an Indian court has "jurisdiction" over acts committed in certain areas we are concerned to ascertain whether such a court community is competent to act. This is to say, an act is not "jurisdictional" at all, but it is possible to state in Federal court, if it orders the trial and punishment of an Indian who is before the court, on the basis of an act which that Indian has performed in the area designated

A question of jurisdiction arises when an Indian who is held to be an Indian civil claims that the judges of such a court are acting without proper authority and that such action, therefore, constitutes assault, false imprisonment, trespass, or some similar offense under State or Federal law. It is, therefore, necessary in passing upon such a jurisdictional question to inquire into the basis of authority upon which an Indian court acts. This is a subject which has been dealt with elsewhere at some length.¹¹

Whether the Indian Court is an administrative Court of Indian Offenses or a trial court, it appears that each has sufficient authority to include in its jurisdiction the trial pent and Congress would have been concerned to do away with the unsatisfactory situation resulting from the uncertain status of the Indians. The bill would have been a simple measure, and would have been in conformity with the basic principle of statutory construction that legislation is intended to correct existing conditions. and punishment of offenses by Indians which were committed on unrestricted land

11. On the one hand, Cont. of Indian Offenses be considered, as suggested in the Chaparral case, to be not regular judicial bodies but "mere educational and disciplinary agencies" intended to inculcate in the Indian mind the principles of discipline which such "contests" undertake will depend upon the relationship between the court and the person disciplined. On this view the location of the offense in which the discipline is inflicted becomes unimportant. It is the nature of the offense which determines the guidelines under which the discipline was acquired. An Indian Service teacher may control the conduct of his pupils and administer discipline on a railroad car traveling through Texas, as well as on restricted Indian land. (See Peak 100, 101.) If a person is disciplined on Indian land, the offense is treated as committed on restricted Indian land, and, if the offender is married or divorced, a member of a given tribe, an eligible candidate for a certain position or office, regardless of where the acts leading to such a personal status may have taken place. So, if action of a Court of Indian Offenses is to be considered as disciplinary in emphasis rather than strictly judicial, such action is not restricted in its location to a given location. The Indiana who assaults his fellow-Indian on an ice patented land within the reservation is subject to disciplinary action by the Court of Indian Offenses. If the assault is committed outside the reservation, the offense had been committed on restricted Indian land. Perhaps the closest analogy to this "educational and disciplinary" theory of the functions of a Court of Indian Offenses is to be found in the common law of domestic violence. The husband is not permitted to exercise his power upon persons with respect to their children. To a certain extent guardians generally may exercise such power over their wards. In none of these cases is the exercise of such authority limited by any consideration of location. (See People v. Williams, 109 Cal. 127, 80 Pac. 292, 4 Ann. 412, 77 Ampr. 68, 573.)

In United States v. Bank 17 Ed. 71, it was held that an Indian ward of the reservation nevertheless was in the charge of an Indian agent within the meaning of a statute (including the sale of land) to such Indians. In Peters v. United States, 17 Ed. 73, it was held that the United States Indians are maintaining their tribal relations, the control and management of their affairs is in the Federal Government irrespective of the title to the land upon which they might, at the time being, be located. In that case the Government was held to be bound to apply to the tribal Indians either as an individual school or as a reservation or on a reservation the title to which was in the Government of Iowa. Moreover, the State criminal law was held not to apply to the removal of a child from a reservation and his detention from a Government school, institution, or hospital, and the Government was held to be concerned only to the Federal Government because of the personal relationship between the Government and its wards. "The relation of dependency existing between tribal Indians and the national government does not grow out of the relation of dependency existing between the Indians and the environment." (Page 73).

This principle has been followed in administrative practice since the beginning. The Superintendents and the Courts of Indian Offenses have not in the past refrained from issuing corrective measures for violations of the regulations. It may be doubted whether the Indian courts have ever made a practice of inquiring into the title of the land where the violation occurred. Nor have the departmental regulations required such inquiry and restraint. The 1891 Act, 26 Stat. 109, and the 1904 Act, 33 Stat. 2257, §§ 654-591, Regulations of the Indian Office, 1904 gave the Com. of Indian Offenses original jurisdiction over Indian offenses, including participation in the Sun Dance, conducting a plural marriage, procuring the attendance of children at a religious or social institution maintained by Indians, "belonging to the reservation," without any limitation as to where the offense might be committed. It was not intended that Indians could dance the Sun Dance and practice polygamy with impunity simply because they did so on nonreservation land. Such a sanction would have been in direct violation of the intent of the regulations. On the contrary, the 1904 regulations were so far as to authorize police surveillance of the Indians leaving the reservation and to contemplate their arrest and punishment for infraction of the rules outside the reservation (section 855-589).

However, whatever may be the disciplinary authority of the Secretary of the Interior over the conduct of Indian wards outside an Indian reservation, the Indian reservation itself has been considered an area peculiarly set apart as a domain within which the Federal Government exercises guardianship over the Indians. This guardianship is extended to all the Indians within the reservation, regardless of their residence or temporary location on unrestricted land. In the early days of the allotment act there was a tendency to withdraw protection from citizen and fee-patented Indians. This tendency was later reversed and Federal guardianship over tribal members has been recognized in spite of citizenship, possession of fee patents or residence on unrestricted land. A recent and far-reaching recognition of administrative supervision over all Indians within the boundaries of the reservation is found in the case of United States v. Deery County, 24 F. (2d) 784 (D. C. 8 D., 1928), aff'd Deery County v. United States, 26 F. (2d) 455 (C. C. 8 D., 1928). The following quotations which uphold the authority of the Department to make rules and regulations governing all the Indians on the reservation, particularly fee-patented Indians residing on fee-patented lands, are set forth because of their peculiar applicability to the questions involved:

"In the light of the plain determination of the question of the right, the power, and the duty of Congress to terminate this relation of guardian and ward, [the fee patent] Indians named in the complaint must be held to be wards of the government, unless there is legislation of Congress plainly indicating the intent and purpose to terminate the relation. Defendant urges consideration of the Act of June 25, 1910 (36 Stat. 853).

"This, in any event, is far short of a congressional declaration that the relationship of guardian and ward shall, by the issuance of the [fee] patent, cease. It is simply a step recognizing some progress by the Indian as being competent to handle the particular piece of land, and the act grants to him only the power to manage and dispose of the particular land. There is neither language plainly expressing, nor from which it may be reasonably inferred, that there is any intent or purpose that they should be taken out of the tribe of Indians, that their tribal relations should cease, and they should have no further interest in the tribal lands or in the moneys to be paid for such lands, that they should, from that time forward, not be subject to the agent provided for the band of Indians to which they belong, nor to the rules and regulations promulgated by the Indian Department as to the government of the reservation and all of the Indians thereon, the education of their children, and the policy that the agent is required to work out with and for the members of the tribes."

"In the absence of further declaration on the part of Congress that the guardianship of the government shall terminate as to these Indians, it seems clear that it must be so held as to those Indians to whom [fee] patents have been issued, who are found by this record to be members of the Cheyenne band of Sioux Indians; that they all had their allotments, that they all resided on their [fee patent] allotments or near them within the original limits of the Cheyenne River reservation, and some of them within the diminished portions thereof; that all of said Indians, at all times mentioned in the complaint, appeared on the rolls at the Cheyenne River agency, that they are entitled to participate and benefit of tribal funds and of the rents and profits of all tribal lands, together with the fact that the government maintains an agency and agent in charge of said tribe of Indians, including those particular Indians named in the complaint, are still wards of the government; that the government is still the guardian of all of these Indians, with control of their property, except in so far as that control of their property is released by the legislation above referred to, and the Indians are thereby granted the power to manage and control the particular piece of land involved in the fee-simple patent." [Italics supplied.]

The foregoing authorities make it clear that if Indian courts are viewed as administrative agencies of the Interior Department, their authority is not limited to offenses committed on restricted land.

If, on the other hand, the Indian courts are viewed as tribal courts, deriving their power from the unmingled fragments of tribal sovereignty, it must be recognized that this sovereignty is primarily a personal rather than a territorial sovereignty. The tribal court has no jurisdiction over non-Indians unless they consent to such jurisdiction. Its jurisdiction is solely a jurisdiction over persons. We must therefore beware of reading into the measure of this jurisdiction the common law principle of the territoriality of criminal law. As was said in the case of Ex parte Tiger, 47 S. W. 304, 2 Ind. T. 41:

"If the Creek Nation derived its system of jurisprudence through the common law, there would be much plausibility in this reasoning. But they are strangers to the common law. They derive their jurisprudence from an entirely different source, and they are as unfamiliar with its tenets and definitions as they are with Scotch or Hebrew."

We must recognize that the general common law doctrine of the territoriality of criminal law has validity in practice only insofar as it is embodied in our criminal statutes. It is not a principle of logic or eternal reason. There are numerous well-recognized exceptions to this doctrine.

There are, in the first place, certain offenses for which citizens of the United States are punishable in United States courts, no matter where the offenses are committed (e. g., 18 U. S. C. Secs. 1, 5). The power of the Federal government to govern the conduct of its citizens abroad by subjecting them, when they return to this jurisdiction, to trial and punishment for offenses committed abroad, has never been successfully challenged (See The Apollon, 9 Wheat. 362, at 370). If this power has been exercised, in fact, only in exceptional cases, that is because as a matter of policy it is generally believed that the power to punish for extraterritorial offenses should be invoked only under special circumstances.

A second departure from the general rule of territoriality is presented by the jurisdiction vested in Congress over Indian affairs. It is well settled that this Congressional jurisdiction does not apply simply to the "Indian country" but applies to offenses no matter where committed.

"The question is not one of power in the national government, for, as has been shown, Congress may provide for the punishment of its citizens wherever committed in the United States. Its jurisdiction is co-extensive with the subject-matter—the intercourse between the white man and the tribal Indian—and is not limited to place or other circumstances." (United States v. Rattahall, 22 Post. 288.)

Again, it is a matter of policy, and not of law, to say how far Congress should extend its laws over Indians "on the reservation." The Indian laws are the outstanding instance of a jurisdiction not limited to offenses committed within the reservation (25 U. S. C. Sec. 241.)

A third recognized departure from the territorial principle is found in the application of Federal laws to our citizens in certain Eastern countries. American committing offenses in unincorporated colonies, for instance, are liable before United States consuls (22 U. S. C. Sec. 150), and Americans committing offenses in China are liable in the United States courts for China (22 U. S. C. Sec. 156 and 767) over which the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Ninth Circuit exercises appellate jurisdiction (22 U. S. C. Secs. 101-202).

A fourth important limitation upon the doctrine of territoriality is the rule that in civil cases a court, while its jurisdiction over the parties may consider all the elements of the case regardless of geographical considerations,

If, then, an Indian court is to be considered a judicial organ of Indian tribal sovereignty, it must recognize that this sovereignty is not a strictly territorial sovereignty, but primarily a personal sovereignty. We may therefore approach the problem of defining the scope of this sovereignty without begging the question by assuming in advance that the sovereignty is limited to any particular kind of land. The recognized exceptions to the usual rule of territoriality are closer to the situation here presented than the rule itself.

In defining the powers of an Indian tribe we look to Federal laws and treaties, not to the basis of sovereignty, but to the limitations on tribal powers.¹¹

In the absence of Federal law to the contrary, it is for the tribe to decide as a matter of its own public policy whether members of the tribe who may properly appear before the public agency of the tribe, shall be liable and punishable for acts committed on unincorporated land. The answer given to the question in the Law and Order Regulation, approved by the Secretary of the Interior November 26, 1945, and approved by numerous tribal councils before and after that date, is unmistakable. Section 1 of Chapter 1 reads:

A Court of Indian Offenses shall have jurisdiction over all offenses enumerated in Chapter 5 when committed by an Indian, within the reservation or reservations for which the Court is established.

With respect to any of the offenses enumerated in Chapter 5 over which Federal or State courts may have lawful jurisdiction the jurisdiction of the Court of Indian Offenses shall be concurrent and not exclusive. It shall be the duty of the said Court of Indian Offenses to order delivery to the proper authorities of the State or Federal Government of any other tribe at reservation, for prosecution, any offender, liable to be dealt with according to law or regulation, authorized by law, where such offenders refused to exercise jurisdiction lawfully vested in them over the said offender.

"For the purpose of the enforcement of these regulations, an Indian shall be deemed to be any person of Indian descent who is a member of any recognized Indian tribe now under Federal jurisdiction, and a 'reservation' shall be taken to include all territory within reservation boundaries, including fee patented lands, trusts, waters, bridges, and lands used for agency purposes."

The question remains, then, whether this statement of authority is in conflict with any Federal law.

That the original sovereignty of an Indian tribe extended to the punishment of a member by the proper tribal officers for depredations or other forms of misconduct committed outside the territory of the tribe cannot be challenged. Certainly we cannot read into the laws and customs of the Indian tribes a principle of territoriality of jurisdiction with which they were totally unfamiliar, and which no member has adopted as an absolute rule. That Indian tribes friendly to the United States acted to punish their members for depredations committed against whites outside of the Indian country is a matter of historical record. Will any one claim that such punishment was unconstitutional? The fact is that the United States, over a long period, encouraged the Indian tribes to help in controlling the conduct of their members outside of the Indian country, and in order to encourage such control made the tribe responsible for such individual offenses.

The absence of Federal laws applicable to the situation under consideration indicates that the right of Indian tribal authorities to punish errant members of the tribe never been denied but has been positively recognized. The act of June 30, 1854 (1 Stat. 781), which is still in many respects the basis of Indian administration, placed upon the Indian "nation or tribe" the responsibility of securing redress for depredations committed by individual members of the nation or tribe outside of, as well as within, the Indian country.¹²

This provision placing responsibility upon the tribal authorities for the wrongs of individual Indians committed outside of the reservation clearly contemplates that the tribal authorities will deal in proper fashion with such individual Indians. While the reason that gave rise to this legislation may have disappeared the tribal basis of tribal action which the legislation assumed has never been challenged.

Provisions similar to that above quoted are found in many treaties with Indians. (See, for instance, Treaty with the Kiowas, et al., May 26, 1857 (7 Stat. 553) Secs. 3, 5, Treaty with the Comanches, et al., July 27, 1851 (13 Stat. 1013), Art. 5, Treaty with the Rogue River Indians, September 10, 1853 (10 Stat. 1078), Art. 6, Treaty with the Blackfeet, October 17, 1857 (11 Stat. 977), Art. 11.)

Federal laws affecting the personal status of Indians have no direct bearing upon our present problem. The General Allotment Law of February 8, 1887 (24 Stat. 390), as amended in the act of May 8, 1906 (34 Stat. 182), provides:

"At the expiration of the trust period and when the lands have been conveyed to the Indians by patent in fee, as provided in section 448, then each and every allottee shall have the benefit of the laws of the State in which he shall live civil and criminal, of the State or Territory in which they may reside." (25 U. S. C. Sec. 101.)

Because of this provision fee patent allottees have been held to be subject to the laws of the State wherever they may be within the reservation. Reynolds v. United States, 274 Fed. 47 (C. C. 9, 1921). Stuart v. Monroe 81 Mont. 556, 274 Pac. 810 (1929). However this fact does not mean that so long as the fee patent Indians live within the outer boundaries of the reservation and maintain tribal relations they are not also subject to the rules and regulations of the Department and to the tribal ordinances governing tribal members. That they are so subject is stated in the recent case of United States v. Denny County, from which extensive quotation to this effect is given above.

Moreover, the allotment act certainly did not make a fee patented allotment a place of sanctuary on which even an unallotted member of the tribe may commit offenses without the risk of future punishment by his tribe. Fee patented lands are undoubtedly subject to State jurisdiction but in the words of the Supreme Court, there is "no denial of the personal jurisdiction of the United States" (United States v. Eshelman, 215 U. S. 278, 251), and neither is there any denial of the personal jurisdiction of the tribe. It is for the Federal Government itself to decide whether it shall retain jurisdiction over certain offenses by Indians, e. g., liquor offenses on fee patented land, and relinquish to the State jurisdiction over certain other offenses. Likewise, it is in the Indian tribe itself, subject only to limitation by Congress, to decide whether it shall retain jurisdiction over certain offenses committed by members of the tribe on such land.

The fact that Federal courts have refrained from taking jurisdiction of Indian offenses on fee patented lands does not negate the jurisdiction of the Indian courts. Since the fallacy of identifying the jurisdiction of the one with the other is a ready one, an analysis of the fundamental distinctions between them is desirable.

The Federal District Courts have been authorized by Congress to exercise jurisdiction over specific crimes committed by Indians or white people against Indians in the "Indian country" and in "Indian reservations." The Federal courts have no jurisdiction other than that granted by Federal statute. On the other hand, the Indian tribes retain all their original jurisdiction over their members except as may be limited by Federal statute. Likewise, the authority of the Department to exercise administrative supervision over Indians is not based upon a statutory specification of crimes and criminal jurisdiction but, as previously indicated, upon a statutory duty of guardianship and Congressional authority thus to maintain order on Indian reservations. See United States v. Quire, 241 U. S. 802, at 805.

The Federal court exercises an absolute and exclusive jurisdiction over Indians when their crimes fall within the circumstances covered by the statutes. There is no statutory authority for concurrent jurisdiction of State and Federal courts when an Indian or Indian land becomes subject to State jurisdiction.²⁸ If the Federal courts have jurisdiction, the State courts do not, and vice versa. However, there is no prohibition on a determination by the Interior Department to exercise corrective measures over Indians within the reservation when the State has jurisdiction but refuses to handle the case or upon a similar determination by the title that members unconnected by State action shall be subject to correction by the tribal court.

Furthermore, the Federal courts are exercising judicial power as courts established by Congress pursuant to the United States Constitution, whereas the Department through the Court of Indian Offenses is not exercising judicial power but administrative guardianship powers, and the tribe is exercising tribal powers over the persons of its members. The establishment of an Indian court and the extent of its jurisdiction is, therefore, in both cases an administrative policy question. No court is established where there is little restricted land. Courts are established, however, where there is much restricted land within a reservation. The Federal courts are obligated to take jurisdiction of crimes coming within the Federal statutes upon restricted lands regardless of administrative need. It would not be argued that there is any obligation on the part of the Department to take corrective measures on such restricted lands if it is not advisable or necessary. In other words, it has often been recognized that the jurisdiction of the Federal courts and of the Indian courts does not coincide, since they derive their authority from different powers and function for different purposes.

I have reviewed the Federal laws which might be viewed as restricting or limiting the power of an Indian court to try and punish an Indian for an offense committed on unrestricted land within a reservation. I find no Federal law imposing any such limitation.

In there any provision of the Federal Constitution that precludes such exercise of jurisdiction? Would such an exercise of authority, in an area where the State may exercise a concurrent jurisdiction, constitute "double jeopardy" and violate the Fifth Amendment to the Federal Constitution?

Even if it could be maintained, in the face of the decision in Tolson v. May, 108 U. S. 370, that constitutional limitations under the "due process" clause are applicable to an Indian court, there is no force in the argument that the exercise of jurisdiction by such a court in these cases would subject the offender to "double jeopardy." The fact that an offense committed outside of restricted Indian lands may be subject to punishment in State courts does not make it unconstitutional for the court of another sovereignty to punish the same person for the same act. The decided cases clearly establish the principle that an individual who in a single act offends against the laws of several jurisdictions may be constitutionally punished by the agencies of each jurisdiction.²⁹

In view of these decisions of the United States Supreme Court it is clear that the fact that an act is punishable in State courts is no bar to punishment in an Indian court. There remains, of course, a question of public policy to be considered in asserting jurisdiction over acts which are subject to another jurisdiction. This question is not in a specific provision in the Law and Order Regulations above set forth, under which cases in which Indian tribal jurisdiction be concurrent with State jurisdiction are to be turned over to State authorities, if such authorities are willing to exercise jurisdiction. This is undoubtedly a reasonable provision in view of the fact that the State may lie, in many cases, unwilling to exercise even an admitted jurisdiction over Indians with respect to acts committed on unrestricted Indian lands within a reservation.

It should further be noted that the Law and Order Regulations do not attempt to cover offenses committed outside of Indian reservations. There is therefore no immediate occasion to consider the legal and administrative problems that would be raised by any such exercise of jurisdiction. It is enough for our present purposes to note that the exercise of jurisdiction by an Indian court, under the departmental law and order or tribal codes, does not diminish the jurisdiction of State courts, does not subject the offender to "double jeopardy," and is not prohibited by any known Federal statute.

There remains the final question whether the action of an Indian court in trying and punishing an Indian for an offense committed within the jurisdiction of the State courts may violate any State law. While it is impossible to decide an issue of this sort in the abstract with entire certainty, it is enough to say that I know of no State legislation which would interfere with such exercise of jurisdiction by an Indian court, and since the matter is one that concerns the relations between an Indian and his tribe it would appear to be a matter on which State legislation would be ineffective. See United States v. Quire, 241 U. S. 802; United States v. Hamilton, 238 Fed. 625; In re Blackbird, 100 Fed. 130; In re Envelin, 120 Fed. 247; and see Opinion M. 28569, approved December 11, 1898, on the right of State game wardens to make seizures on an Indian reservation.

In view of the foregoing authorities I am of the opinion that an Indian court which orders the trial and punishment of an Indian before the court, on the basis of acts committed on unrestricted lands within an Indian reservation, does not offend against any State or Federal law.³⁰

In certain offenses the nature of the offense and the character of the laws in question establish Federal jurisdiction without reference to the question whether the accused or the injured party is an Indian.³¹ In other offenses, jurisdiction depends among other things upon the persons involved. In the following sections (3-8) we shall deal with jurisdiction over offenses in Indian country as affected by the character of the parties.

²⁸ See United v. May, 108 U. S. 10 (1852); United States v. Lanza, 260 U. S. 377, 379-380, 822 (1922).

³⁰ In this offense (Intoxication liquor into Indian country) neither race or color are significant. United States v. Sutton, 215 U. S. 8, 201, 205 (1909). Accord: Perin v. United States, 293 U. S. 478 (1934).

SECTION 3. CRIMES IN INDIAN COUNTRY BY INDIAN AGAINST INDIAN

Offenses committed by Indians against Indians within the Indian country are ordinarily subject to the jurisdiction of tribal courts. This is a consequence of the doctrine of tribal self-government.³² In determining whether an offense by an Indian against an Indian falls within the jurisdiction of tribal courts, we look to federal laws and treaties only for the limitations on tribal authority. The most important of such limitations is found in the Act of March 8, 1885.³³ This act brought under federal jurisdiction certain offenses committed by Indians against Indians, notably murder, manslaughter, rape, assault with intent to kill, arson, burglary, and larceny. In later years robbery, incest, and assault with a dangerous weapon were added to this list.¹ A few other federal statutes relating, mostly to non-Indians as well as Indians, are applicable to offenses by Indians against Indians committed on an Indian reservation.

It has been held that where jurisdiction over murder or manslaughter is thus conferred upon the federal courts such jurisdiction is exclusive and the tribal courts may not act to punish a member of the tribe who has killed another member.² Authority on this point, however, is not conclusive, and it would be a

SECTION I. CRIMES IN INDIAN COUNTRY BY INDIAN AGAINST NON-INDIAN

An Indian committing offenses in the Indian country against a non-Indian is subject to the Act of March 3, 1885, section 9,³ which, with an amendment, became section 328 of the United States Criminal Code of 1910 and now is section 548 of title 18 of the United States Code,⁴ providing for the prosecution in the federal courts of Indians committing, within Indian reservations, any of 10 (formerly 7, then 8) specially mentioned offenses whether against Indians or against non-Indians.⁵ Apart from

It is not clear whether or how far the Act of 1885 applied to the so-called "Indian Territory." By Art. 18 of the Cherokee Treaty of July 10, 1866, 11 Stat. 709, 803 (see Chapter 1, sec. 2), the establishment of a court of the United States in the Cherokee territory was provided for. * * * with such jurisdiction and organized in such manner as may be prescribed by law. Provided, That the judicial tribunals of the nation shall be allowed to retain exclusive jurisdiction in all civil and criminal cases arising within their country, in which members of the nation, by nativity or adoption, shall be the only parties, [italics added] or where the cause of action shall arise in the Cherokee nation, except as otherwise provided in this treaty.

Further, sec. 20 of the Act of May 2, 1890, 26 Stat. 81, 94, providing a temporary government for the Territory of Oklahoma and enlarging the jurisdiction of the United States court in the Indian Territory, provided:

* * * That the judicial tribunals of the Indian nations shall retain exclusive jurisdiction in all civil and criminal cases arising in the country, in which members of the nation by nativity or by adoption shall be the only parties [italics added]. * * *

and sec. 81 declared that:

* * * nothing in this act shall be so construed as to deprive any of the courts of the civilized nations of exclusive jurisdiction over all cases arising between members of said nations, whether by treaty, blood, or adoption, are the sole parties, [italics added] nor so as to interfere with the right and power of said civilized nations to make laws for the regulation of the relations of the states and laws enacted by their national councils where such laws are not contrary to the treaties and laws of the United States.

such inference that it is precluded from dealing with such matters as petty larceny between members of a tribe.

While, as noted, the jurisdiction of the tribe over offenses between Indians does not depend upon federal statutory authority, it may be noted that the policy of the Federal Government to respect such tribal jurisdiction is embodied in a series of statutes stretching back to the Act of March 3, 1817,⁶ which, after establishing federal jurisdiction over Indian offenses, declared:

Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to affect any treaty now in force between the United States and any Indian nation, or to extend to any offense committed by one Indian against another, within any Indian boundary.

Early treaties guaranteeing tribal jurisdiction over matters affecting only Indians have been elsewhere discussed.⁷

⁷ See Chapter 4, sec. 30, 31 and 32.

These "ten major crimes," an Indian committing offenses in the Indian country against a non-Indian is subject to the code of federal territorial offenses,⁸ except in two situations: (a) Where he "has been punished by the local law of the tribe" and (b) "where, by treaty stipulations, the exclusive jurisdiction over such offenses is or may be secured to the Indian tribes respectively." The substance of the present law on this subject goes back to early treaties, some of which antedated the Federal Constitution, stipulating that Indians committing offenses against citizens of the United States should be delivered up to their tribes to be tried, or to be punished according to the ordinances of the United States.⁹

The first federal enactment dealing generally with crimes by Indians against non-Indians in Indian country was the Act of March 3, 1817.¹⁰ This provision was subsequently incorporated in section 25 of the Trade and Intercourse Act of 1884.¹¹

It will be noted that this act omits that portion of the thirteenth article of the treaty, wherein is reserved to the judicial tribunals of the nation (exclusive jurisdiction) "where the cause of the action shall arise in the Cherokee Nation," and that to extent apparently supercedes the treaty. Construing the word "arising" as meaning not only to the crime and not simply to the prosecution of the crime, it would appear that the Act of 1817 would apply to the "Indian Territory" only in cases where the offense was one of an Indian against a non-Indian. So construed in Adley v. United States, 102 U. S. 400 (1880). Followed in Woffe v. United States, 104 U. S. 337 (1880). In a indictment for murder in the Cherokee Nation, Indian Territory, averring both deceased and accused were white men, proof that the deceased was a white man establishes the jurisdiction, and the averment as to the citizenship of the accused is surplusage. Henson v. United States, 26 Fed. 100 (C. C. A. 5, 1878), rev'd 102 U. S. 11 (1880). In a case where the Indian defendant is treated as the sole party, the Indian courts would have jurisdiction whether the victim of the crime was Indian or non-Indian. This was done in a case of adultery, in which the name of the prosecuting witness did not appear and since there was no adverse party, the woman being a consenting party, the Indian defendant was regarded as the sole party to the proceeding. In re Knutfield, Peterson, 141 U. S. 107 (1891).

¹⁰ Stat. 828, designating as a crime any act committed by any person in the Indian country, under the laws of the United States, would be a crime if committed in a place where which the United States had sole and exclusive jurisdiction. That this act comprehended crimes by Indians is indicated by the fact that the general language was qualified by a proviso excepting crimes by Indians against other Indians. The proviso further declared that existing treaties were to remain unimpaired.

¹¹ Act of June 30, 1884, 4 Stat. 726, 738. Section 25 of this act contained a repeal of the 1817 act. Murder committed by an Indian and became part of section 8 of the Act of March 27, 1854,¹ from which section 2145 of the Revised Statutes, now 25 U. S. C. 217, was derived.

The first of the two exceptions noted—that relating to Indians punished by the local law of the tribe—first appears in the 1851 act:

§ 1031. a non-Indian without the limits of the state and district of Arkansas and within Indian country, in the absence of a state attaching the Indian country west of Arkansas thereto, was held not to fall within the jurisdiction of the recent court, which had no jurisdiction over such country. United States v. Liberty, 24 Fed. Cas. No. 13486 (C. C. Ark. 1843). The child of an Indian mother and white father was considered to be of the condition of the mother for the purposes of the criminal provisions of the 1841 Intercourse Act. United States v. Seaver, 27 Fed. Cas. No. 10629 (C. C. Ark. 1847).

§ 1031a. 28th, 27th. An offender is amenable for the crime of adultery with the laws of the nation in accord with Art. 13 of Treaty of July 18, 1866, with the Cherokees, 14 Stat. 709. In re Mayfield Petitioner, 141 U. S. 107 (1891). Also see Alberry v. United States, 112 U. S. 489

"The second of the exceptions noted—involving cases where treaties have provided for exclusive tribal jurisdiction—has its origin in the 1817 act:

(1816), Yager v. United States, 104 U. S. 657 (1897), Famous Smith v. United States, 131 U. S. 50 (1884) [discussing Indian citizenship in reference to applicability of treaty]. A white man incorporated with an Indian tribe at a mature age, by adoption, does not thereby become an Indian, so as to cease to be amenable to the laws of the United States, but he may become entitled to certain privileges to the tribe and also make himself amenable to their laws and usages. Therefore, an article of a treaty pardoning all offenses committed by citizens of the Cherokee Nation against the nation had the effect of pardoning an Indian who had previously committed murder in Cherokee country against a white man who had been adopted by that tribe. United States v. Ragsdale, 27 Fed. Cas. No. 16113 (C. C. Ark. 1847). Murder committed by an Indian against a non-Indian in the Indian country, within the boundaries of the territory, not coming within any of the exceptions, is within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States branch of the territorial district court. United States v. Monte, 3 N. M. 173 3 Pac. 16 (1884). But cf. United States v. Towell, 28 Fed. Cas. No. 14522 (C. C. Ark. 1840).

SECTION 5. CRIMES IN INDIAN COUNTRY BY NON-INDIAN AGAINST INDIAN

Generally speaking, offenses by non-Indians against Indians are punishable in federal courts where the offense is one specified in the federal code of territorial offenses.²

This was not always the rule. Early treaties frequently provided that non-Indians committing offenses in the Indian country against Indians should be subject to punishment by tribal authorities.³ This rule, which followed the usual practice in international treaties, was abandoned after a few years of treaty-making, and many of the later treaties expressly provide that white offenders shall be delivered up to the federal authorities for prosecution.⁴

The exercise of federal jurisdiction over non-Indian offenders against Indians in the Indian country was first put on a statutory basis by the original Trade and Intercourse Act, the Act of July 22, 1790.⁵ The relevant sections declared:

Sec. 5 That if any citizen or inhabitant of the United States, or of either of the territorial districts of the United States, shall go into any town, settlement or territory belonging to any nation or tribe of Indians, and shall there commit any violence upon, or trespass against, the person or property of any peaceable and friendly Indian or Indians, which, if committed within the jurisdiction of any state, or within the jurisdiction of either of the said districts, against a citizen or white inhabitant thereof, would be punishable by the laws of such state or district, such offender or offenders shall be subject to the same punishment, and shall be proceeded against in the same manner as if the offence had been committed within the jurisdiction of the state or district to which he or they may belong, against a citizen or white inhabitant thereof.

Sec. 6 That for any of the crimes or offences aforesaid, the like proceedings shall be had for apprehending, imprisoning or hauling the offender, as the case may be, and for recognizing the witnesses for their appearance to testify in the case, and where the offender shall be committed, or the witnesses shall be in a district other than that in which the offence is to be tried, for the removal of the offender and the witnesses or either of them, as the case may be, to the district in which the trial is to be had, as by the act to establish the judicial courts of the United States, are directed for any crimes or offences against the United States.

These provisions were reenacted with minor modifications in the later territorial Trade and Intercourse Acts of 1793, 1796, and 1799,⁶ and were embodied in the first permanent Trade and Intercourse Act of 1802⁷ in sections 2 to 10, inclusive. The general rule established by these statutes was continued in the Act of March 3, 1817,⁸ which provided:

That if any Indian, or other person or persons, shall, within the United States, and within any town, district, or territory, belonging to any nation of nations, tribe or tribes, of Indians, commit any crime, offence, or misdemeanor, which, if committed in any place or district of country under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, would, by the laws of the United States, be punished with death, or any other punishment, every such offender, on being thereof convicted, shall suffer the like punishment as is provided by the laws of the United States for the like offences, if committed within any place or district of country under the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States.

Sec. 2 That the superior courts in each of the territorial districts, and the circuit courts and other courts of the United States, of similar jurisdiction in criminal cases, in each district of the United States, in which any offender against this act shall be first apprehended or brought for trial, shall have, and are hereby invested with, full power and authority to hear, try, and punish, all crimes, offences, and misdemeanors, against this act, such courts proceeding therein, in the same manner as if such crimes, offences, and misdemeanors, had been committed within the bounds of their respective districts, Provided, That nothing in this act shall be so construed as to affect any treaty now in force between the United States and any Indian nation, or to extend to any offence committed by one Indian against another, within any Indian boundary.

Sec. 3 That the President of the United States, and the governor of each of the territorial districts, whose any offender against this act shall be apprehended or brought for trial, shall have, and exercise, the same powers, for the punishment of offences against this act, as they can severally have and exercise by virtue of the fourteenth and fifteenth sections of an act, entitled "An act to regulate trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes, and to preserve peace on the frontiers," passed thirtieth March, one thousand eight hundred and two, for the punishment of offences therein described.

The Trade and Intercourse Act of June 30, 1834,⁹ reenacted the rule developed in the earlier statutes. This rule was subsequently incorporated in the Revised Statutes as section 2443 and in title 27 of the United States Code as section 217. The exceptions contained in title 25 of the United States Code, section 218, relating to offenses by Indians against Indians and to offenders punished by tribal law have no application to offenses committed by non-Indians against Indians. The third exception in section 218 dealing with the case of a treaty where the exclusive jurisdiction over such offenses is secured to the Indian tribes might have current application but no such treaty provisions appear to be now in force.

Apart from the foregoing general statutes, Congress has from time to time enacted various laws to punish particular offenses committed by non-Indians against Indians within the Indian country.¹¹

¹¹ See Chapter 7, sec. 9 to 225.

SECTION 6. CRIMES IN INDIAN COUNTRY BY NON-INDIAN AGAINST NON-INDIAN

Ordinarily offenses committed by a non-Indian against a non-Indian in the Indian country are of no concern to the Federal Government and are punishable by the state.¹² For purposes of criminal jurisdiction where Indians are not involved, an Indian reservation is generally considered to be a portion of the state within which it is located.¹³ Exceptions to this rule exist where

Congress has specifically provided for exclusive federal jurisdiction over certain areas.¹⁴

That of the Congress of the United States¹⁵ does not amount to a reservation by the United States of jurisdiction over crimes committed on such lands by non-Indians against non-Indians and does not deprive the state of its power to try such offenses. Thompson v. United States, 164 U. S. 240 (1896).

SECTION 7. CRIMES IN AREAS WITHIN EXCLUSIVE FEDERAL JURISDICTION

Section 217, title 25,¹⁶ extends to Indian reservations with exceptions already noted, "the general laws of the United States as to the punishment of crimes committed in any place within the sole and exclusive jurisdiction of the United States, except the District of Columbia."¹⁷ A list of such offenses will be found in chapters 11 and 18 of title 18, United States Code.¹⁸

This list is meager and inadequate in comparison with most state codes. It is supplemented by section 468 of title 18, United States Code,¹⁹ which makes acts, not made penal by any other laws of Congress, committed upon land within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States subject to federal prosecution whenever made criminal by state law.

SECTION 8. CRIMES IN WHICH LOCUS IS IRRELEVANT

There are certain offenses covered by federal statutes regarding Indian affairs which are subject to federal jurisdiction regardless of the locus of the offense. Several such offenses are purchasing 1 D. cattle without permission,²⁰ selling liquor to Indians,²¹ making prohibited contracts with Indian tribes.²²

The power of Congress to punish such crimes outside the Indian country is well established.²³

SECTION 1. INTRODUCTION

As applied to the courts, jurisdiction may be defined as the power of a court to hear and determine matters or controversies of a justiciable nature arising within the limits to which the judicial power of those courts extends. We may consider the subject of civil jurisdiction² from the standpoint of the federal courts, including constitutional and legislative courts, such as the Court of Claims, and federal administrative tribunals, and also from the standpoint of the state courts, and the tribal courts.

SECTION 2. FEDERAL COURTS

Speaking generally, it may be said that the judicial power of the United States is vested by the Constitution in the Supreme Court and such other courts as Congress shall from time to time ordain and establish.³

In considering the jurisdiction of the federal courts, it may be observed that under the Constitution⁴ and laws⁵ of the United States the federal courts exercise jurisdiction in two different classes of cases: cases where the jurisdiction depends upon the character of the parties, and cases where the jurisdiction depends upon the subject matter of the suit. The distinction between these two classes of cases has been recognized from the beginning. Thus, in *Coke's v. Virginia*⁶ the Supreme Court of the United States, speaking through Mr. Justice Marshall, said:

In one description of cases, the jurisdiction of the court is founded entirely on the character of the parties; and the nature of the controversy is not contemplated by the constitution—the character of the parties is everything, the nature of the case nothing. In the other description of cases, the jurisdiction is founded entirely on the character of the case, and the parties are not contemplated by the constitution—in those, the nature of the case is everything, the character of the parties nothing.⁷ (P. 393.)

Taking this proposition as a point of departure, we shall consider the subject briefly, in so far as the Indians are concerned, under the following headings:

A Cases where the jurisdiction of the court depends on the character of the parties, including the United States as plaintiff, defendant or intervenor, cases where an Indian tribe is plaintiff, defendant or intervenor, cases where individual Indians are plaintiffs, defendants or intervenors.

B Cases where the jurisdiction of the court depends on the character of the subject matter.

A. JURISDICTION DEPENDENT UPON PARTIES

(1) United States as plaintiff.

(a) Generally.—It may be stated as a general proposition (that under subdivision 1 of section 41 of title 28 of the United States Code, the district courts of the United States have jurisdiction of all suits of a civil nature, at common law or in equity, in which the United States is the plaintiff. Ordinarily the general jurisdiction of the district court is established by the mere fact that the United States is plaintiff. Thus, in United States v. Board of County Commissioners of Grady County, Oklahoma,⁸ wherein the United States sought to enjoin the defendants from diverting surface drainage water from a state public highway over an Indian allotment, the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit, notwithstanding the claim of the defendants and the decision of the court that the suit was virtually one against the State of Oklahoma and could not be maintained, upheld the jurisdiction of the district court, saying:

²U. S. Const., Art. III, sec. 1.

⁴28 U. S. C. § 41.

"There was no tenable objection to the general jurisdiction of the District Court. It was expressly conferred by title 28, § 41, and 1, of the U. S. Code, 28 U. S. C. § 41 (1), in providing that the District Courts shall have jurisdiction "first, of all suits of a civil nature, at common law or in equity, brought by the United States . . ."

"Nevertheless, as suggested above, in order for the United States to maintain a suit and that the court may pass upon the merits of the case and enter a valid judgment therein it must be a suit which the United States is authorized to maintain.¹ In cases where the United States is seeking to enforce a measure of government enacted in the exercise of its constitutional powers, there is no question as to the authority of the United States to apply to its own courts for relief.² In cases where the United States sues for the benefit of a third party, it may be stated that as a general rule it must have an interest in the subject matter or purpose of the suit and the relief sought. This interest does not necessarily have to be a pecuniary one, it is sufficient if it is a governmental one.³

"(b) Indian cases.—A pecuniary interest of the United States itself need not exist in cases involving restricted Indian lands⁴ or land in which the United States is trustee.⁵ It is well settled that the United States, by virtue of its peculiar relations with the Indians—often called "guardianship"⁶—or as trustee of their property, has the capacity and the duty to effectuate Government policies by protecting and enforcing their rights in property held by it as trustee,⁷ or by the Indians themselves in fee simple, subject to restrictions on alienation.⁸

"The United States acts in behalf of itself and as trustee on behalf of the Indians.⁹ When proceeding on its own behalf the United States is (a) protecting its guardianship over the Indian, and (b) removing unlawful obstacles to the fulfillment of its obligations.¹⁰ In *United States v. Fitzgerald*¹¹ the court said:

"The United States may lawfully maintain suits in its own courts in present interference with the means it adopts to exercise its powers of government and to carry into effect its policies. It may maintain such suits, although it has no pecuniary interest in the subject-matter thereof, for the purpose of protecting, and enforcing its governmental rights, and to aid in the execution of its governmental policies." (P 294-297.)

"The right of maintaining a suit arises pursuant to provisions in treaties with Indian tribes¹² or congressional laws, or by virtue of the fact that legal title to land is vested in the United States, subject to the Indian right of occupancy or by reason of the fact that the Indian enjoys a vested right, granted by the Government to hold land tax-exempt for a specified period.¹³ Usually the property involved is restricted land held by an Indian under a trust or other patent from the United States, or purchased for an Indian out of lands derived from the sale of allotted lands and restricted by the Secretary of the Interior,¹⁴ or by a mere right of occupancy, title being in the United States. Sometimes the case involves personal property furnished by the Government to the Indian, to be used by him in connection with an allotment, without the right of disposal except to other Indians, or held in trust by the United States for him, or affected by such trusts.

"(c) Nullity involving land.—It has often been held that the United States lacks the capacity to sue regarding lands held by Indians which have been taken from restrictions,¹⁵ because it is under no duty to the Indians and has no interest in the matter.¹⁶ However, the Government has a duty and an interest to protect the right of the Indian to hold his land free from taxation for the trust period of 25 years, and the relationship between the United States and the Indian with respect to this vested right is regarded as the legal relationship of trusteeship which gives the United States the capacity to sue on behalf of the Indians,

¹ The Supreme Court of the United States, in United States v. Minnesota, 210 U. S. 181, 191 (1908) said:

" . . . the United States has a real and direct interest in the matter presented in examination and adjudication. Its interest arises out of its guardianship over the Indians, and out of its right to invoke the aid of a court of equity in removing unlawful obstacles to the fulfillment of its obligations, and in both respects the interest is one which is vested in it as a government. *Johnson v. to recover illegal taxes or restrain collection of taxes levied on land freed from restrictions.²⁰

The United States may sue to enforce the imposition of local or state taxes on allotted lands or permanent improvements thereon, of personal property obtained from the United States, and used by the Indians on the allotted lands. The leading case in which the United States obtained an injunction against county officials attempting to tax allotted lands during the trust period is the case of United States v. Rickett.²¹ The Supreme Court said:

We do not perceive that the Government has any remedy at law that could be at all efficacious to the protection of its rights in the property in question and for the attainment of its purposes in reference to these Indians. If the personal property and the structures on the land were sold for taxes and possession taken by the purchaser, then the Indians could not be maintained on the allotted land, and the Government, unless it abandoned its policy to maintain these Indians on the allotted lands, would be compelled to appropriate more money and apply it to the creation of other necessary structures on the land and to the purchase of other stock required for purposes of cultivation. And so on, every way. It is manifest that no proceedings at law can be prompt and efficacious for the protection of the rights of the Government, and that adequate relief can only be had in a court of equity, which, in a comprehensive decree, can finally determine once for all the question of validity of the assessment and taxation in question, and thus give security against any action upon the part of the local authorities tending to interfere with the complete control, not only of the Indians by the Government, but of the property supplied to them by the Government and in use on the allotted lands. Rickett v. Rickett, 22 Wall. 444, 459; County of Murray v. South Dakota, 114 U. S. 550, 564-66.

Some observations may be made that are applicable to the whole case. It is said that the State has conferred upon these Indians the right of suffrage and other rights that ordinarily belong only to citizens, and that they ought, therefore, to take the Indians of government like other people who enjoy such rights. These are considerations to be addressed to Congress. It is for the legislative branch of the Government to say when these Indians shall cease to be dependent and assume the responsibilities attaching to citizenship. That is a political question which the courts may not determine. We can only deal with the case as it exists under the legislation of Congress.

The Supreme Court,²² in holding that the United States may sue to enforce discriminatory state taxes levied on allotments of noncompetent Osage Indians, said:

Certain is it that as the United States is guardian of the Indians had the duty to protect them from spoliation and, therefore, the right to prevent their being illegally deprived of the property rights conferred under the Act of Congress of 1906, the power existed in the officers of the United States to invoke relief to the accomplishment of the purpose stated. Indeed the Act of Congress of 1917, providing for the apportionment of the Lands in question, by necessary implication, if not in express terms, treated the power of the officers of the United States to resist the illegal assessments as undoubted.

And the existence of power in the United States to sue which is thus established disposes of the proposition that because of remedies afforded to individuals under the state law the authority of a court of equity could not be invoked by the United States. The authority of the United States, in the first place, is the authority of the United States extended to all the non-competent members of the tribe if obviously justified that the imposition of a court of equity to prevent the wrong complained of was essential in order to avoid a multiplicity of suits. See Union Pacific Ry. Co. v. Chicago, 113 U. S. 670; Smith v. Ames, 100 U. S. 400, 577; Crunkshank v. Rickett, 170 U. S. 74, 81; Boise v. Arizona Indian Co. v. Boise Tribe, 211 U. S. 276, 283; Greene v. Louisville & Indianapolis R. R. Co., 244 U. S. 400, 500. In the second place because as the wrong relied upon was not a mere mistake or error committed in the enforcement of the state tax laws, but a systematic and intentional disregard of such laws by the state officers for the purpose of destroying the validity of the whole class of non-competent Indians, who were subject to the protection of the United States, it follows that such class wrong and disregard of the state statute gave rise to the right to invoke the intervention of a court of equity in order that an adequate remedy might be afforded. Channing v. National Bank, 101 U. S. 151; Reynolds v. Farmers Loan & Trust Co., 174 U. S. 362, 380; Pittsburgh etc. Ry. Co. v. Barkley, 154 U. S. 421; Canfield v. Louisville & Nashville R. R. Co., 106 U. S. 599; Reynolds v. Chicago & North Western Ry. Co., 207 U. S. 30; Greene v. Louisville & Indianapolis R. R. Co., 244 U. S. 399, 507. In fact the subject is fully covered by the ruling in Union Pacific R. R. Co. v. Weld County, 217 U. S. 289 (pp. 285, 286).

Where restrictions on land are imposed, the Government can choose such legal remedies as are necessary to protect the Indian. It may maintain an action to quiet the title to land. "to set aside conveyances made prior to the expiration of the trust period, restore possession to the Indian even though the allottee is a citizen," or where title has been vested in the allottee but the right of alienation is restricted. "The Government may bring suit to cancel deeds and mortgages," "to set aside conveyances," "to annul a patent issued by the United States in order to establish possessory rights of individual Indians," "to set aside inequitable contracts," "to sue for a cancellation of a mining lease and assignment of rents and royalties issuing therefrom," "to cancel oil and gas leases." The Government may sue a lessee and a surety company which signed a faithful performance bond for a breach of a lease, involving trust lands, made by an allottee and approved by the Secretary.¹⁰ The United States may sue to obtain possession on tribal lands and on restricted allotments.¹¹ It may enjoin the ascension of rights under leases of restricted allotments or of land held by the United States in trust for a tribe obtained from an Indian without conforming to the statutory and administrative requirements, and may enjoin the negotiation of such unlawful leases in the future.¹²

Even where interested Indians are involved, the federal court has jurisdiction over cases based on statutory law-exemptions.¹³ The right of the United States to bring suits in behalf of Indians involving their lands after the period of trust or restrictions has expired, and to which the United States is no title is, subject in many cases, among them United States v. Henry,¹⁴ in which the United States brought suit to recover royalties and under an assignment allegedly made during the period of restrictions, the suit being brought after the period had expired.¹⁵

¹³ In United States v. Houston, 243 Fed. 851 (C. C. A. 8, 1917), suit was brought by the United States not as guardian but as trustee of lands to a mixed-blood Indian against Decker County, Minn., officials, to restrain collection of taxes levied upon certain allotted lands. In this case the Government had surrendered the guardianship over the Indian owner with respect to his land in the Acts of June 21, 1906, 34 Stat. 425, 174 and March 1, 1907, 41 Stat. 1075, 1041. The court held that the right of the Indian to hold his land free from taxation for the first period of 25 years was a vested right which the Government could not take and that hence when the Indian was claiming no right under the Acts of June 21, 1906, and March 1, 1907, but was insisting upon holding his land under the trust which his land could not be taxed by the State. The relationship between the United States and the Indian with respect to this vested right was looked upon by the court as the legal relationship of trusteeship, giving the United States capacity to sue in behalf of the Indian.

But we entertain no doubt that a court of equity has the power to cancel it (certificate of competency) effective from the date of and may bring action for rent on behalf of an individual Indian or a tribe.²¹ It may recover restricted funds deposited in a local bank, such indebtedness of the bank being an indebtedness to the United States and entitled to priority over other deposits.²²

(e) Other suits—The right of the United States to bring suit on behalf of Indians has been upheld in a variety of cases not involving restricted property.²³ Thus it has been held that the Government may recover in a suit filed in connection with a contract of employment of Indians in a wild west show. The damages would include incense of contract and expenses incurred returning the Indians to the agency, as well as the amount due the Indians.²⁴

(f) Effect of judgment—The Government is not bound unless it is a party to the litigation.²⁵ No judgment of any court, state or federal, rendered in a suit between an Indian and a private party, involving property under the control of the Government, to which the Government is a stranger, can bind the Government on its administrative effects.²⁶ Where the Government has employed and paid a special attorney to represent the Indians, at the United States Attorney has joined as associate counsel with the attorneys representing the Indians in the litigation and filed a motion to vacate the judgment, the United States is bound as effectively as if it were a party by the judgment in a suit instituted and prosecuted to final judgment by this special attorney.²⁷

²⁸ Justice Van Devanter, in the case of United States v. Gaudin, 271 U. S. 432 (1926).

The Indians of the pueblo are wards of the United States and hold their lands subject to the restriction that the same cannot be alienated in any wise without the sanction of the United States, and hence while operates directly or indirectly to transfer the lands from the Indians, where the United States has not authorized or approved in the suit, impairs that restriction. The United States has an interest in maintaining and enforcing the restriction which cannot be affected by such a judgment or decree. This Court has said in dealing with a like situation "It necessarily follows that, as a condition of the alleged lands contract to the inhibition of Congress would be a violation of the governmental rights of the United States arising from its obligation to its dependent people, no alienation, contract, or judgment rendered in suits to which the Government is a stranger, can affect its interest. The authority of the United States to protect its dependent has not been impaired or impaired by any action without its consent." Barlow and Adams Improvement Co. v. United States, 253 U. S. 528, 531. And that ruling has been recognized and given effect in other cases. Purcell v. United States, 250 U. S. 201, 204-205. United States v. United States, 260 U. S. 226, 232. (Pp. 448-451.)

But, as it appears that for many years the United States has employed and paid a special attorney to represent the Pueblo

In *United States v. Candelaria*¹² two judgments had been obtained against a Pueblo in New Mexico in suits brought by it to clear title to its land—one in a territory court, concluded in the state courts after statehood, and the other in the federal court—in neither of which the United States was a party. Ordinarily, judgments rendered in a suit to which the United States is not a party do not bind upon the United States. The court, after referring to the fact that under territorial laws, sanctioned by Congress, the Pueblo was a juristic person, with capacity to sue and defend with respect to its land, citing Lane v. Pueblo of Santa Rosa,¹³ held that the state court of New Mexico had jurisdiction to enter a judgment in an action by an Indian Pueblo against opposing claimants concerning title to land, which would be conclusive on the United States if the latter authorized the bringing or prosecution of the suit, or if an attorney employed by the United States appeared on behalf of the Pueblo in the case.

The United States is not bound by a judgment in which a tribal attorney, employed by the tribe under a contract approved by the Secretary of the Interior and paid from tribal funds, had appeared and represented individual Indians. In Logan v. United States,¹⁴ the Circuit Court of Appeals, said:

"To sustain the plea, appellant's counsel relies upon United States v. Candelaria, 271 U. S. 432, 46 S. Ct. 761, 70 L. Ed. 1023. The distinction, as we see it, between that case and this is that it appears there that the attorney who represented said litigation in a case of the same character and between the same parties in the state court was employed and paid by the United States, whereas in this case the superintendent and his attorney, in making the interpleur in the state court, were not paid as such officers by the United States, but annual appropriations have been made by Congress and were borne in whole at that time, and it was provided that they should be paid out of the lands held by the Secretary of the Interior for the same Indians. The tribal attorney was selected by the tribe. They were not, therefore, the representatives of the United States, in making the interpleur. There is no showing that the Secretary of the Interior advised that the interpleur be made. We, therefore, conclude that the United States, as plaintiff in this suit, was not bound by the action of the courts court in denying the interpleur." (C. 608.)

If the United States is entitled to institute an action on its own behalf and on behalf of the Indians, the Indians cannot determine the course of the suit or settle it contrary to the position of the Government.¹⁵ The Indians, being represented by the Government are not necessary parties.¹⁶

Indians and look after their interests our job was made with the indication that, if the decree was rendered in a state court and prosecuted by the special attorney so employed and paid, we think the United States is as officially concluded as if it were a party to the suit. Reynolds v. Comptroller of Forestry, 217 U. S. 476, 480, Loring v. Mayes, 3 Wall. 3, 38, Chaffin v. Fischer, 7 Fed. Res. 859, Mingo v. United States, 102 U. S. 444, James v. Candelaria (Ind. ¹⁶ Miner v. Hirschbeck, 186 U. S. 878, 387 (1902). In the case of Jackman v. United States, the Supreme Court said:

"The statement necessarily proceeds upon the assumption that the representation of these Indians by the United States is of an incomplete or inadequate character, that although the United States, by virtue of the guardianship it has assumed, is prosecuting this suit in the purpose of enforcing the restrictions Congress has imposed, and in the exercise of its power to the Indians (the presence as parties to the suit is essential to their protection). The position is wholly irreconcilable with the fact that the special representative has been appointed on the part of the United States in acting on behalf of those dependent—whom Congress, with respect to the reserved lands, has not yet released from tutelage. Its efficacy does not depend upon the Indians' acquiescence. It does not rest upon compulsion, nor is it disannulled by sales which govern private relations. It is a representation which

The 6-year statute of limitations which thus against the United States in relation to unimproved land patents is inapplicable when the suit is to protect the rights of Indians, and does not run against members of Indian tribes for claims on federal income taxes wrongfully deducted in the Indian superintendent from funds due to them." It is also settled that said statutes of limitation or other state statutes neither bind nor have any application to the United States when same tend to enforce a public right or to protect the interests of its wards.¹⁷

If Congress provides a statutory method for determining Indian land claims, and the claim is held invalid, the United States cannot later reopen the question.¹⁸

Some statutes, instead of the Attorney General to bring suit in the name of the United States to quiet title to Indian land,¹⁹ or authorize the Attorney General, upon the request of the Secretary of the Interior, to appear in suits involving Indian tribal lands,²⁰ without requiring Indians to be made parties, or, authorize the Secretary to authorize the Attorney General to bring suit in the name of the United States to quiet and settle title to disinterested land²¹ or allotted lands.²²

(2) United States as defendant—The general rule is that the United States cannot be sued in any court, whether state or federal, without its consent.²³

has its source in the phrase contained in Congress in legislation, for the protection of the Indians, that it is not and it recognizes no limitations that are inconsistent with the doctrine of the implied duty.

When the United States, in litigation, it is not to look to represent, and the represent the Indian activities whose consent or consent is not a part of the suit, and in those cases, parties, but the Government was in suit on their behalf. They were in parties could not add to or detract from the act of the parties, in determining the violation of the restrictions and the consequent invalidity of the conveyance for the act of Congress, it was prohibited from obtaining their lands. They were likewise included in Indian affairs in position in the land proceeding, included by the Government to enforce the restrictions, which would permit such proceedings, whether or not, appear to the Indians, etc. The case could not be dismissed upon their consent (it could not come to pass, it was not that they were in suit with respect to their lands, which would detract from its complete representation by the United States. This is involved necessarily in the claim, that the United States is entitled to, and in the nature and purpose of the suit. (Pp. 444-446).)

extends to cases in which a state of the Union is the plaintiff. Thus in *Minnesota v. United States*¹ the Supreme Court held that the United States could not be made a party defendant in proceedings instituted by the State of Minnesota to condemn allotted Indian lands held in trust by the United States for the allottees. The court said:

"A proceeding against property in which the United States has an interest is a suit against the United States. The Sioux, 7 Wall. 152, 161; Car v. United States, 98 U. S. 124, 137; Stanley v. Schickel, 162 U. S. 277. Compare Utah Power & Light Co. v. United States, 243 U. S. 280. It is consequently the owner of the fee of the Indian allotted lands and holds the same in trust for the allottees. As the United States owns the fee of these patents, the right of way cannot be condemned without making it a party. (P. 285.)

But the United States cannot be made a party in such a suit without its consent. The court further said:

"The exemption of the United States from being sued without its consent extends to a suit by a State. Compare Kansas v. United States, 204 U. S. 431, 342; Arizona v. California, 238 U. S. 653, 704, 571, 572. Compare Mississippi v. Hitchcock, 187 U. S. 373, 382-387; Oregon v. Hitchcock, 202 U. S. 60. Hence Minnesota cannot maintain this suit against the United States unless authorized by some act of Congress. (P. 287.)

If the required consent is given, the objection being removed the court may settle the controversy involved.²

The United States is improperly joined as a party defendant in a suit against an Indian tribe under a special act authorizing the Court of Claims to consider and adjudicate such claim where neither the special act nor any general statute authorized suit against the United States, although the United States is joined in the suit in the capacity of trustee for an Indian tribe.³

Terms and conditions on which consent is given may be prescribed and must be met.⁴ Not only may the court prescribe the terms and conditions on which it consents to be sued, but it may also determine the manner in which the suit shall be conducted and may withdraw its consent whenever it supposes that justice to the public requires such withdrawal.⁵

The cases in which the United States has expressly given its consent to be sued in Indian matters either in the Court of Claims or in the district courts are numerous.⁶

*v. Equitable Trust Co.*⁷ In that case a suit was instituted by a next friend in behalf of an incompetent full-blood Creek Indian under guardianship to recover accumulated royalties which had come into the hands of the Secretary of the Interior in trust for the Indian and were subsequently distributed upon a written request in the name of the Indian procured by fraud. The United States intervened in the litigation. By this act, the Supreme Court held, it implicitly consented to reasonable allowances for services and expenses, even if the fund was subject to statutory restrictions. This decision, however, may be explained by the fact that the United States had intervened in the suit in the character of a party plaintiff.

(3) United States as intervenor.—In view of the established doctrine that the United States cannot be sued without its consent, the question arises whether the United States can become a party to a pending suit by intervention, and if so, under what circumstances. It appears that where an intervention places the Government in the position of a plaintiff, as in *New York v. New Jersey*⁸ and Oklahoma v. Texas,⁹ the Government may properly become an intervenor. It is clear, however, that if by such intervention the Government would become virtually a defendant in the suit, its appearance as an intervenor would come in direct conflict with the ruling that the United States cannot be sued. The consent of the United States cannot be given by any officer of the United States unless authority to do so has been conferred upon him by some act of Congress. This proposition is illustrated in the case of Stanley v. Schickel,¹⁰ in which the Supreme Court said:

"The United States, by various acts of Congress, have consented to be sued in their own courts in certain classes of cases, but they have never consented to be sued in the courts of a State in any case. Neither the Secretary of War nor the Attorney General, nor any subordinate officer, has been authorized to waive the exemption of the United States from judicial process, or to submit the United States, or their property, to the jurisdiction of the court in a suit brought against them officers. Car v. United States, 98 U. S. 124, 137; Car v. United States, 98 U. S. 124, 137; Car v. United States, 98 U. S. 124, 137. (P. 270.)

In other words, in the absence of congressional authority no officer of the United States can bind the United States as a party defendant, whether in an original suit or by way of intervention. Instances in which the United States has given such consent are to be found in the Act of February 8, 1901,¹¹ permitting suits for allotment in the district courts of the United States, permitting law service to proceed upon the Attorney General and requiring the District Attorney, upon whose service is also to be made, to appear and defend the interests of the United States in the suit, and in the Act of April 10, 1903,¹² providing a process whereby the United States may be compelled to appear and defend its interests in any suit pending in the federal or state courts of Oklahoma in which restricted members of the Five Civilized Tribes are parties. The practice adopted under this statute is for the United States Attorney to appear for and in behalf of the United States, within the statutory period, upon service of the notice upon the superintendent as provided by the statute.

having some of the attributes of sovereignty usually possessed by independent communities, have been declared by the Supreme Court not to be either states of the Union or foreign nations within the meaning of Article III, section 2 of the United States Constitution giving original jurisdiction to the Supreme Court in controversies in which a state of the Union or a citizen thereof, and a foreign state or subjects and citizens thereof are parties.¹⁰ Consequently an Indian tribe as such cannot sue, be sued, or intervene in any case where the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court is invoked.¹¹

Whether a tribe can sue or be sued under the diversity of citizenship clause of section 41 (1) of title 28 of the United States Code in the federal courts is a moot question. An Indian tribe as such is not a citizen within the meaning of that clause. If it were incorporated under the laws of the United States it could not sue or be sued under the diversity of citizenship clause unless there were an act of Congress providing that the tribe should be considered as possessing a state citizenship for jurisdictional purposes.¹²

The statutes which confer upon tribes capacity to sue or to be sued, and the question of whether, in the absence of such a statute such suits may be maintained, are elsewhere treated.¹³

(7) Individual Indian as party litigant—As a general rule, an Indian irrespective of his citizenship in tribal relations, may sue in any state court of competent jurisdiction to redress any wrong committed against his person or property outside the limits of the reservation.¹⁴ But the mere fact that the plaintiff is an Indian does not vest jurisdiction in the federal courts.¹⁵

This being true, the only grounds upon which a federal court could take jurisdiction of a suit by an Indian would be either because of diversity of citizenship between the plaintiff and defendant or because the cause of action arose under the Constitution, treaties, or laws of the United States. In Davis v. St. Lawrence River Paper Company,¹⁶ the rule as to the first branch of this proposition is succinctly stated:

Diversity of citizenship is not relied upon to grant jurisdiction. Nor may this action be maintained merely because the appellant is an Indian. . . .
Originally the members of an Indian tribe were not regarded as citizens, neither naturalized, either collectively or individually, under some treaty or law of the United States, and, consequently, they could not sue in the federal courts on the ground of diversity of citizenship.¹⁷ In cases, however, where an individual Indian, although a member of a tribe, was a citizen of the United States by virtue of some treaty or law of Congress, all other elements of federal jurisdiction were present, he could sue under this clause.¹⁸

B JURISDICTION DEPENDENT UPON CHARACTER OF SUBJECT MATTER

As to the character of the subject matter as an element of federal jurisdiction, it is to be observed that the cases are considerably in conflict in determining whether an action arises under the Constitution, treaties, or laws of the United States. It is quite clear, however, that the federal question must appear by specific allegations in the bill of complaint, and not from facts developed either in the answer or in the course of the trial.¹⁹

A number of general statutes confer jurisdiction on federal courts concerning the jurisdiction over defined subjects of Indian concern upon the federal courts.²⁰

¹⁰ See Peltz v. Patrick, 148 U. S. 317 (1892) wherein the Supreme Court said:

It is scarcely necessary to say in this connection that, while until this time the granting of citizenship under Act VI, Twenty of April 20, 1868, 15 Stat. 882) they were not citizens of the United States, capable of suing as such in the federal courts, the courts of Missouri were open to them as they are to all persons irrespective of race or color. See 152 U. S. 693, 14 Kan. 282, 41, Blue Jacket v. Johnson County, 3 Kansas 280, 10 Wey v. Graham, 4 Kansas 64 (P. 332).

And see Chapter 8, see 6.

To sustain the contention that the suit was one arising under the laws of the United States, counsel for the appellants point to the statutes (Act March 3, 1875, 19 Stat. 676, June 10, 1876, 12 Stat. 500, 121 April 26, 1906, 34 Stat. 137, c. 1876, 42) relating to the allotment of lands of the lands of the Creek Nation, the treaty, and citation thereof after allotment the making of allotments to the heirs of deceased children and the rights of the heirs, collectively and severally, as such allotments, but the bill makes no mention of these statutes or of any controversy or pending there. Validity of constitution on effect. Neither does it by necessary implication point to such a controversy. This point, counsel to indicate that the statutes constitute the substantive law of the plaintiff's title of right, and also shows that the defendants are in some way claiming the land and particularly the land and its interests in him, but beyond this the nature of the controversy is left unstated and mention of the cause it could have arisen in different ways, wholly independent of the source from which his title of right was derived, no looking only to the bill as we have seen that we must, it cannot be held that the case as therein stated was one arising under the statutes mentioned. It was said in Blackburn v. Portland Gold Mining Co., supra, a controversy in respect of lands has never been regarded as presenting a federal question merely because one of the parties in it has derived his title under an act of Congress. . . . (P. 370).

A suit to enforce a right which takes its origin in the laws of the United States is not necessarily one that arises under one arising under those laws, but a suit does not so give unless it really and substantially involves a dispute or controversy involving the validity, construction or effect of such a law upon the determination of which the result depends. This is especially so of a suit involving rights to land acquired under a law of the United States. If it were not, every suit to establish title to land in the central and western States would so arise as all titles in these States are traceable back to those laws. Taft v. United Land and Water Co., 30 Ky. 36, 111 1991 (Colorado United Land and Water Co. v. Taft), supra, Blackburn v. Portland Gold Mining Co., 177 U. S. 573, Florida Central & P. Ry. v. Florida, 30 Ky. 36, 111 1991 (Shelburne Mining Co. v. Taft), 377 U. S. 400, De Laman's Nevada Co. v. Schmitt, 142 Ky. 111 506-570).

Where, then, involving the title to a piece of Indian land in which the title depended upon construction of an act of Congress, but the parties and courts below proceeded upon the theory that it did so, the Supreme Court of the United States may peremptorily annul the bill as to as to allege that fact, and so establish jurisdiction. Smith v. McWhorter, 370 U. S. 161 (1928). See also Woodhouse v. Redwood, 370 U. S. 21 (C. C. 1, 1931).

SECTION 3. COURT OF CLAIMS

While the United States cannot be sued without its consent,¹² yet it may be sued with its consent in any court or tribunal which Congress shall create or designate for the purpose, upon such terms or conditions and regulations as Congress shall see fit to prescribe, and the jurisdiction thus conferred may be held to be subject to whatever limitations are prescribed in the act or resolution of Congress conferring such jurisdiction.

No law as the Court of Claims is concerned its jurisdiction rests upon these general propositions, and therefore the extent of that jurisdiction is to be measured by the provisions of the jurisdictional act of Congress by which it is conferred in particular instances where such jurisdiction is invoked.¹³ In other words, the Court of Claims has no general jurisdiction over claims against the United States, and can take cognizance only of those which by the terms of some act of Congress are committed to it.¹⁴ Statutes which extend the jurisdiction of the Court of Claims and permit the Government to be sued are usually strictly construed, and the grant of jurisdiction therein contained must be shown clearly to cover the case and if it does not it will not be applied.¹⁵

With reference to claims by Indians against the United States the rule is not different from that stated above, since "the moral obligations of the Government toward the Indians, whether they may be, are for Congress alone to recognize, and the courts can exercise only such jurisdiction over the subject as Congress may confer upon them."¹⁶ In Klamath Indians v. United States,¹⁷ the Supreme Court, in construing the Act of May 28, 1920,¹⁸ conferring jurisdiction upon the Court of Claims to adjudicate "all claims of whatsoever nature" of the Klamath Indians against the United States "which had not theretofore been determined by that Court," declared that jurisdictional acts conferring upon an Indian tribe the privilege of suing the United States in the Court of Claims, are to be strictly construed and held, accordingly, that the Act of 1920 did not embrace a claim which the Indians had settled with the Government before and for which they had given a valid release, even though the consideration for this release was grossly inadequate. In this connection the Supreme Court said:

If the release stands, no money or property is due plaintiffs, for the settlement and release wiped out the claim.

In many instances the jurisdiction of the Court is limited to matters in which the claim has not heretofore been determined by the Court of Claims or the Supreme Court.¹⁴

In some instances Congress has authorized submission to the Court of Claims of Indian claims theretofore settled and adjusted.¹⁵

So far as claims of individuals against Indian tribes or members thereof are concerned, it is unquestionable that Congress may refer such claims to the Court of Claims or any other tribunal and vest in that court such general or limited jurisdiction as it shall see fit, and may authorize the United States to be made a party defendant to the proceedings.¹⁶ In individual claims of this nature are not intelligent,¹⁷ and the jurisdiction conferred by such statutes upon the Court of Claims is usually expressed in such language as to "inquire into and finally adjudicate"³²⁶ to "hear, adjudicate, and render judgment"³²⁷ to "hear, consider, and adjudicate"³²⁸ to "hear, determine, and render final judgment,"³²⁹ to "rehear, rebear, determine, and finally adjudicate,"³³⁰ to "rehear and reconsider and determine the motion filed" therein by the claimants,³³¹ or to "restitute" causes so far as the same pertain to the claim of the claimant, upon facts as previously found and returned by the court, and is authorized to enter judgment in said cause in favor of the plaintiff,³³² or a claim is referred to the court together with the record or papers in a previous cause lawfully heard in said court and the court is authorized and directed "to order proof to be taken" with respect to the claim.³³³

In some instances the court has been authorized and directed to entertain jurisdiction in Indian depredation claims³³⁴ or a private claimant has been authorized to prosecute an Indian's depredation claim pending in that court and to receive judgment therein,³³⁵ or the claimant is authorized to bring suit in the Court of Claims against the United States.³³⁶

By section 182 of the Judicial Code,³³⁷ in any case brought in the Court of Claims under any act of Congress by which that court is authorized to render a judgment or decree against the United States, or against any Indian tribe or any Indians, or against any fund held in trust by the United States for any Indian tribe or for any Indians, the claimant, or the United States, or the tribe of Indians, or other party in interest shall have the same right of appeal as is conferred by the other sections of the code, and such a right is to be exercised only within the time and in the manner that is prescribed.

In individual claims with respect to Indian lands alleged by the claimant to have been appropriated by the United States Government without right or title thereto, and without authority either in law or in equity, the jurisdiction is conferred on the Court of Claims "to proceed, according to the principles and rules of both law and equity, to find the facts" embracing the amount that is to be paid to the claimants.³³⁸

While Congress may refer to the Court of Claims or any other tribunal which it may create or designate any Indian claim for adjudication, it cannot refer such claim directly to the Supreme Court for that purpose. The reason is that under the Constitution the original jurisdiction of the Supreme Court extends only to cases "affecting Ambassadors, other public Ministers and Consuls, and those in which a State shall be party,"³³⁹ and Congress can neither enlarge nor restrict that jurisdiction.³⁴⁰ Thus, it having been early decided in Cherokee Nation v. Georgia, that an Indian tribe is not a state in the sense that this word is used in the Constitution, the Supreme Court has held that Congress cannot refer directly to it, for adjudication, the claim of an Indian tribe, for that would be to invoke a jurisdiction which that Court cannot exercise under the Constitution, although the matter might be referred to the Court of Claims in the first instance, and brought to the Supreme Court by way of appeal if the necessary congressional legislation to that end was provided.³⁴¹

Nor has Congress constitutional authority to enlarge the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court by allowing appeals from judgments of the Court of Claims in cases not of a judicial nature, for conceding that Congress may confer upon the Court of Claims extra-judicial power as it has in numerous instances, yet the appellate jurisdiction of the Supreme Court under the Constitution is strictly judicial, and any attempt on the part of Congress either to enlarge or to diminish that jurisdiction would be unconstitutional and void, as an encroachment on the judicial power vested by the Constitution in that tribunal.³⁴²

With respect to so-called moral claims, or claims based on a supposed moral obligation of the United States toward the Indians, whatever the circumstances under which they may arise, if they exist at all, it is for Congress to consider whether they shall be recognized, and being political in nature they would seem to fall outside the jurisdiction of the courts.³⁴³ It is believed, however, that Congress may properly refer such claims to the Court of Claims for adjudication.³⁴⁴ Whether it may also allow an appeal from the decision of the Court of Claims to the Supreme Court is a question upon which the Supreme Court has not passed. But if Congress should provide by appropriate legislation a definite standard upon which the validity of the claim could be determined and proper relief afforded to the parties to the suit as a matter of law, there would seem to be no objection to the allowance of the appeal, for then the judicial power of the United States would be called into play in any case or controversy arising under such legislation and submitted to the Court of Claims in the first instance, and the Supreme Court on appeal for adjudication. In other words, the claim under such legislation would be justiciable in nature, and therefore cognizable by the Court.³⁴⁵

³²⁸ By the Act of March 8, 1883, the claims of the New York Indians for the value of certain lands in Kansas not apart for them under the Treaty of January 15, 1838, 7 Stat. 650, were referred to the Court of Claims with direction to report its proceedings to the Senate. The court reported the findings to the Senate on January 16, 1892, and thereupon, on January 26, 1893, Congress passed an act authorizing the Court of Claims "to hear and determine these claims and to enter up judgment as it had original jurisdiction of this case without regard to the statute of limitations", with the right of appeal by either party to the Supreme Court. *New York Indians v. Ordinarily the Supreme Court will not review findings of facts of the Court of Claims¹²⁰ and the opinion of the Court of Claims will not be referred to for the purpose of eliciting, controlling, or modifying the scope of the findings.¹²¹ The Supreme Court has repeatedly held that the findings of the Court of Claims in an action at law determine all matters of fact, like the verdict

SECTION 4. FEDERAL ADMINISTRATIVE TRIBUNALS

While the judicial power of the Federal Government is vested by Article III of the Constitution in the Supreme Court, and in such inferior courts as the Congress may from time to time ordain and establish with respect to cases therein enumerated, yet there are many matters relating to the execution of powers delegated to Congress by other provisions of the Constitution which are susceptible of judicial determination, and those Congress may or may not bring within the cognizance of the federal courts, as it may deem proper.¹²² That Congress may refer such matters to special tribunals and clothe them with functions deemed essential or helpful in carrying into execution other powers delegated to it by other articles of the Constitution, would seem to be beyond question.

With reference to the Obotaw and Chickasaw Citizenship Court, otherwise known as the Dawes Commission, which was originally created by the Act of March 3, 1898,¹²³ the Supreme Court said in the case of Ex parte Bakellie Corp.:¹²⁴

 It was created to hear and determine controverted claims to membership in two Indian tribes. The tribes were under the guardianship of the United States, which in virtue of that relation was proceeding to distribute the lands and funds of the tribes among their members. How the membership should be determined rested in the discretion of Congress. It could commit the task to officers of the department in charge of Indian Affairs, to a commission or to a judicial tribunal. As the controversies were difficult of solution and large properties were to be distributed, Congress chose to create a special court and to authorize it to determine the controversies. In Wokoe v. Adams, 204 U. S. 415, this was held to be a valid exertion of authority belonging to Congress by reason of its control over the Indian tribes. (P. 457.)

When a matter has been entrusted by an act of Congress to the exclusive cognizance of a special tribunal or administrative officer, and the decision of that tribunal or officer made exclusive, the federal courts have no jurisdiction to reexamine it for alleged errors of law. Thus in Hallipoll v. Commone,¹²⁵ in which the question involved was as to the jurisdiction of the federal courts under the Acts of August 15, 1894,¹²⁶ and of a jury, and that where there is any evidence of a fact which they find, and no exception is taken, their finding is final.¹²⁷ Nor will findings of mixed fact and law be reviewed by the Supreme Court on appeal from the Court of Claims.¹²⁸

It may be added that after the Supreme Court has received a judgment of the Court of Claims and affirmed it, the Court of Claims, like any other court whose judgment has been reviewed by the Supreme Court, must give effect to it and carry it into effect according to the mandate, without variation or other further effect.¹²⁹

February 6, 1901,¹³⁰ to review a decision of the Secretary of the Interior determining the heirs of a deceased allottee under the Act of June 25, 1910,¹³¹ the Supreme Court, in affirming the decree of the court below dismissing the bill for want of jurisdiction, said:

It is unnecessary to consider whether there was jurisdiction when the suit was begun. By the Act of June 25, 1910, c. 481, § 6 Stat. 535, it was provided that in a case like this of the death of the allottee intestate during the trust period the Secretary of the Interior should ascertain the legal heirs of the decedent and his decision should be final and conclusive; with considerable discretion as to details. Thus act restored to the Secretary the power that had been taken from him by acts of 1894 and February 6, 1901, c. 217, § 1 Stat. 700. McKoy v. Kalyton, 204 U. S. 453, 458 (1907). It made his jurisdiction exclusive in terms, it made no exception for pending litigation, but purported to be universal and so to take away the jurisdiction that for a time had been conferred upon the courts of the United States.¹³²

The judgment of a special tribunal empowered to pass upon judicial questions cannot be attacked for fraud or mistake unless the fraud alleged and proved is such as to prevent a full hearing. Thus in *United States v. Atkins*¹³³ the Supreme Court held that the Dawes Commission in enrolling a name as that of a Creek Indian alive on April 1, 1899, when duly approved by the Secretary of the Interior as provided by the Act of June 10, 1896,¹³⁴ amounted to a judgment in an adversary proceeding, establishing the existence of the individual and his right to membership; that such judgment was not subject to attack and could not be annulled for fraud unless the fraud alleged and proved was such as to have prevented a full hearing within the doctrine approved in former decisions of the Court.¹³⁵

SECTION 5. STATE COURTS

In matters not affecting either the Federal Government or the tribal relations, an Indian has the same status to sue and be sued in state courts as any other citizen.¹³⁰

It may be stated however, as a general proposition, that the state courts have no jurisdiction in civil matters affecting the restricted property or tribal relations of the Indians, unless ¹³⁰See Felix v. Fairbrock, 145 U.S. 817, 832 (1902). Ka-swo-ah-gwah v. McClure, 132 Ind. 641, 38 N.E. 1580 (1896) (suit against Indian on promissory note); Sisco v. Ouliere, 81 Tex. 883, 17 S.W. 19 (1891) (cause of action against railroad assigned by Indian) commented on in note, 18 L.B.A. 542, and see also therein cited. With respect to the jurisdiction of state courts over Indians, a leading student of the subject declares " * * * Indians are not extrajurisdictional but only subject to a special rule of substantive law " (P 98). The same writer comments:

In civil matters the lacuna of federal legislation are so enormous that the state courts are left to legislate practically fills the gaps, subject to proof of a positive Indian custom that varies the law. Thus federal legislation in detail there, Indian custom fills; but state law practically covers much of the ground. (W.G. Ellis, The Position of the American Indian in the Law of the United States (1924) 15 J. Comp. Leg. 75, 92.)

otherwise provided by Congress,¹³¹ so long at least as the United States retains governmental control over them. This is particularly so with respect to allotted lands and the transfer of any right, title, or interest thereto whether by way of purchase or descent, including wills, partition, condemnation, or judicial decree.¹²⁸ As stated by the Supreme Court in McKay v. Kalyton,¹²⁹

The McKay case [188 U S 432, 485 (1903)] settled that as the necessary result of the legislation of Congress, the United States retained such control over allotments as was essential to reserve the allotted land to ensure during the period in which the land was to be held in trust, "for the sole use and benefit of the allottee." As observed in the Smith case, 181 U S 408 (Hippopotamus-Law v. Smith, 181 U S 401, 408 (1901)), prior to the passage of the act of 1884 (Act of August 15, 1884, 28 Stat. 250, amended by the Act of February 6, 1901, 31 Stat. 760), "the sole authority for settling disputes concerning allotments resided in the Secretary of the Interior." This being settled, it follows that prior to the act of Congress of 1884 controversies necessarily involving a determination of the title and incidentally of the right to the possession of Indian allotments while the same were held in trust by the United States were not primarily cognizable by any court, either state or Federal. (F 488.)

As to the question of jurisdiction to determine heirs and effectuate a distribution or partition of allotted lands, a distinction must be noted as between lands held under a trust patent and lands held under a patent in fee. As to the latter it is sufficient to notice that after a fee patent has been issued all question relating to the transfer of title to the allotted lands must be determined by the laws of the state where the land is located.¹³⁰ The reason for this is simply that the allottee holds the land in his individual capacity, and as to that land he has become emancipated, and since the land is located within the limits of the state, the tribal laws, as opposed to the state laws, cannot reach that land.¹³¹

As to lands held by the allottee under a trust patent, it will be observed that the provisions of section 5 of the General Allotment Act are silent as to the question of jurisdiction to determine heirs or to effectuate a partition of lands. Since Congress has conferred upon the Secretary of the Interior final authority to determine heirs and to effectuate partition of such lands¹³² it is clear that no court, state or federal, has jurisdiction to determine heirs with respect to allotted Indian lands while the title thereto remains in the United States.¹³³ Nor has any court, whether state or federal, any jurisdiction to partition or distribute such lands.¹³⁴ And the same is true as to lands allotted to Indians under fee simple patents subject to restrictions upon alienation without the approval of the Secretary of the Interior or some other federal agency selected by Congress for the purpose.¹³⁵

¹²⁸ McKay v. Kalyton, 204 U S 438 (1907), Little Bell v. Houston, 64 Wash. 602, 117 Pac 481 (1911), Gray v. McKnight, 75 Okla 268, 183 Pac 480 (1919).

The federal courts first assumed jurisdiction in matters involving allotments of Indian lands after the passage of the Act of August 15, 1884, 28 Stat. 250 as amended by the Act of February 6, 1901, 31 Stat. 760, 29 U S C 345, providing that one who claimed to have been unlawfully deposed or excluded from any allotment to which he claimed heretofore to be entitled under any treaty or act of Congress, might commence and prosecute or defend any action, suit, or proceeding in relation to his right thereto in the proper circuit court (district court) of the United States, and that the jurisdiction of any such court in (over) any of them should have the same effect, when properly certified to the Secretary of the Interior, as if such allotment had been allowed and approved by him. This act, however, did not apply to the Five Civilized Tribes, not to any lands within the Gipsy Indian Agency. But clearly the purpose of the act was not to confer jurisdiction upon the federal courts in matters of inheritance or descent as such, its purpose had reference merely to the right of an allottee to sue in those courts for an original allotment. McKay v. Kalyton, 204 U S 438 (1907), and of Blown v. United States, 198 U S 614 (1905), as to the determination of heirs the Act of 1901, with its 1901 amendments, if applicable at all, was repealed by the Act of June 25, 1910, 36 Stat. 858, confining jurisdiction on such matters upon the Secretary of the Interior, Bond v. United States, 181 Fed. 618 (C C Oro 1910), Pak-Lia-Taket v. United States, 188 Fed. 687 (C C Idaho, 1910), Paw v. United States, 197 Fed. 802 (C C A, 1912). The Act of 1901 did not repeal, however, the Act of 1891, no the amendatory act of 1901 with respect to the right of Indians to sue in the federal courts for an allotment. United States v. Payne, 204 U S 446 (1924), First Moon v. White, 270 U S 248 (1926). No did the Act of 1901 make new law respecting the jurisdiction of the Secretary to determine heirs, since it was merely declaratory of the previously existing law. See Yallowell v. Commons, 240 U S 600 (1916). And neither the Act of 1894, nor the Act of 1901 affected the authority of the Secretary of the Interior, but only gave to the federal courts concurrent jurisdiction on such matters. Daugherty v. McFarland, 40 S D 1, 106 N W 148 (1918). The method and procedure adopted by the Secretary of the Interior in exercising his authority under the Act of 1910 is thus stated in his decision in the Grass One case, 42 L D 408, 406-7 (1918).

The Secretary of the Interior is, as it were, counsel for both plaintiff and defendant as well as judge upon the bench. He does not wait for a case to be brought before him; he goes into the country, investigates the necessary proceedings through his representatives in the field, collects the necessary evidence which may be in the form of depositions of the parties, or in the form of interrogatory affidavits, etc., and renders his decision on legal questions. He is not a judge, but a fact-finder. The scope of his duties specifically provides that his decisions shall be under "such rules and regulations as he may prescribe." It is evident, therefore, that the Secretary is not bound by the decisions or decrees of any court in inheritance matters affecting Indian lands. He is not bound by the decisions of any court, from the evidence submitted, as to the determination of Indian heirs.

¹³⁰ Partition of Indian lands constitutes an "alienation" within the meaning of federal laws imposing restrictions thereon. Cherokee v. Gaillard, 85 Okla 71, 162 Pac 738 (1917); Lenox v. Galt, 70 Okla. 251, 178 Pac 2188 (1918). In Bynum and Nashberry, 114 Okla. 217,

"The United States has retained such control over the allotments to Indians that, except as provided by acts of Congress, controversies involving the determination of title to, and right to possession of, Indian allotments while the same are held in trust by the United States are not primarily cognizable by any court, state or Federal."

"The act of August 15, 1884, 28 Stat. 250, delegating to Federal courts the power to determine questions involving the rights of Indians to allotments did not confer upon state courts authority to pass upon any questions over which they did not have jurisdiction prior to the passage of such act, either as to title to the allotment, or the mere possession thereof, which is of necessity dependent upon the title." (McKay v. Kalyton, 204 U S 438 (1907).)

¹³¹ The judicial determination of controversies concerning lands allotted to Indians in severally and held by the United States in trust for the allottee has been commonly committed exclusively to federal courts, and not to the state courts. Greenwood v. United States, 308 U S 385 (1939), McKay v. Kalyton, 204 U S 438 (1907), yet after the issuance of a fee patent in the name of a deceased allottee under the General Allotment Act of February 8, 1887, 24 Stat. 388, as amended by the Act of March 3, 1906, 34 Stat. 152, all questions pertaining to the title to the allotted land are subject to examination and determination by the courts—appropriately those in the state where the land is situated. And see United States v. Waller, 243 U S 453, 460 (1917), wherein the doctrine of partial condemnation is clearly recognized. See also and compare Leahy v. Peapack, 208 U S 481 (1903).

¹³² Act of June 25, 1910, 36 Stat. 858. See Chapter 5, sec 11 and Chapter 11, sec. 6.

A suit for the possession of allotted Indian lands instituted under state laws is not within the jurisdiction of the state courts regardless of the merits of the controversy so long as the title to those lands is in the United States.³⁰⁷ That state courts have no jurisdiction to entertain a suit for the condemnation of allotted Indian lands held by the United States in trust for the allottee unless such jurisdiction is specifically conferred by an act of Congress has been settled by the Supreme Court in Minnesota v. United States, decided in 1889,³⁰⁸ and the same rule applies in cases involving title lands.³⁰⁹ With respect to lands allotted in severalty to Indians while the title remains in the United States it is to be observed that under the second paragraph of section 3 of the Act of March 3, 1901,³¹⁰ such lands may be condemned for any public purpose under the laws of the state or territory where they are located "in the same manner as land owned in fee may be condemned," and the money awarded as damages is to be paid to the allottee. But this provision does not authorize a suit in the courts of a state to condemn such land, it merely authorizes condemnation for "any public purpose under the laws of the State or Territory where located."³¹¹

The fact that such a suit may have been removed to a federal court on petition of the United States and that a stipulation may have been entered into by its attorney in relation thereto is without legal significance, for where jurisdiction has not been conferred by Congress no office of the United States has power to give to any court jurisdiction of a suit against the United States.³¹²

As Congress has not given its consent to the institution of a condemnation suit of this sort in the state courts, the federal courts are therefore without jurisdiction upon its removal for the jurisdiction of the federal court upon such removal is, in a limited sense, a derivative jurisdiction and where the state court lacks jurisdiction of the subject matter or of the parties, the federal court acquiesces none, although in a like suit originally brought in a federal court it would have had jurisdiction.³¹³

248 Pac 604 (1920), modifying opinion 101 Okla 207, 236 Pac 610 (1926), a decree in partition, rendered by the United States Court for the Western District of the Indian Territory, of unallotted land between full blood citizens of the Creek Nation was held to be void for want of jurisdiction of the subject matter since section 22 of the act of Congress of April 20, 1906, 34 Stat 137, restricted the inherited land of full-blood citizens of Creek tribe against alienation and the estate in attempting to partition the land was, in effect "an alienation" of certain portions of the land away from certain heirs and vesting the title in other heirs.

³⁰⁷ See McKay v. Kalyton, 304 U S 458 (1907). In that case the Supreme Court said:

"The suggestion made in argument that the controversy here presented involved the mere possession and not the title to the allotted land is without merit, since the right to the asserted ownership is dependent upon the existence of an equitable title in the claimant under the legislation of Congress to the ownership of the allotted lands. Indeed, that such was the case plainly appears from the excerpt which we have made from the concluding portion of the opinion of the Supreme Court of Oregon.

"Because from the considerations previously stated we are constrained from the conclusion that the court below was without jurisdiction to entertain the controversy, we must not be considered as intimating an opinion on the question that the principles applied by the court in disposing of the merit of the case were erroneous." The controlling principle which prevents a court, whether state or federal, from exercising any power or jurisdiction to adjudicate any matter involving the transfer of any right, title, or interest in or to restricted allotted Indian lands is that the United States in the exercise of its plenary and exclusive power over the Indians and their property may adopt such measures as it may deem necessary and proper for their welfare and protection.³¹⁴ and the state courts without legislative authority have no power or jurisdiction to interfere with or circumvent those measures.³¹⁵ Consequently the mere fact that the lands involved in a suit brought in a state court may have been allotted to an Indian is not sufficient to oust the state court jurisdiction. It must also appear that such lands are either held by the United States in trust for the allottee or his heirs, or that they are subject to restrictions against alienation under some act of Congress or treaty of the United States with the Indians. It is to be observed, also in this connection, that the mechanics of a suit in court require that the facts showing the existence or non-existence of jurisdiction shall appear. Thus if the bill makes out a case within the jurisdiction of the court that jurisdiction is not ousted or defeated merely because the defendant may allege in its answer that the land or other property is restricted, for that only puts in issue the determination of a fact upon which the court necessarily must pass in order to determine whether it can proceed, and if the court's decision on that issue is in favor of the defendant the suit, of course, must be dismissed for want of jurisdiction, otherwise the court may proceed to judgment, and that judgment, unless appealed from and reversed by the appellate court, will be binding on the parties, whether the decision is right or wrong.³¹⁶

The United States, however, would not be concluded by such judgment if it were not a party to the suit or did not give its consent thereto.³¹⁷

There is no case where the jurisdiction of the court depends upon the subject matter it has repeatedly been held by the Supreme Court that if the allegations of the bill or declaration make a claim that it well founded so within the jurisdiction of the court, it is within that jurisdiction whether well founded or not. Hart v. Knott Vandalia Machine, 262 U S 271, 278 (1923), Louisville & Nashville R. Co. v. Rice, 247 U S 251, 258 (1918), General Furniture Manufacturing Co. v. S. Karpson & Bros, 268 U S 264, 265 (1915), The Pak v. Kohler Die & Specialty Co., 228 U S 22, 25 (1911). In General Furniture Manufacturing Co. v. S. Karpson & Bros, supra, the Supreme Court said that jurisdiction is

"... the power to consider and decide one way or the other as the law may require, and is not to be declined merely because it is not foreseen with certainty that the outcome will help the plaintiff." (P. 266)

And in Hart v. Knott Vandalia Machine, supra, the Supreme Court said:

"The jurisdiction of the District Court in the only matter to be considered on this appeal is that the bill or declaration is a claim that it well founded is within the jurisdiction of the court. It is within that jurisdiction whether well founded or not." (P. 278)

SECTION 6. TRIBAL COURTS

That an Indian tribe has power to confer upon its own courts jurisdiction over controversies involving Indians is a proposition supported by authorities which have been already analyzed.²⁵ That "full faith and credit" are due to decisions rendered by tribal courts in cases properly within their jurisdiction, is a second basic principle in the field of civil jurisdiction which is supported by authorities elsewhere analyzed.²⁶ There remains the question how far the power to confer upon tribal courts such jurisdiction has been actually exercised.

This is a matter on which there are few federal statutes, the question having been left primarily to the action of the tribes themselves. One of the few federal statutes which refer to tribal jurisdiction over civil cases is section 229 of title 25 of the United States Code.²⁷ This statute provides that where injuries to property are committed by an Indian, application for redress shall be made by the appropriate federal authorities "to the nation or tribe to which such Indian shall belong, for satisfaction." It has been noted by the Solicitor for the Interior Department²⁸ that this provision assumes that the Indian tribe has the means of compelling return of stolen property or other forms of satisfaction where its members have violated the rights of non-Indians.

Apart from this general statute, special provision has been made by federal law with respect to the tribal courts in the Indian Territory. The jurisdiction of these courts, both in civil and in criminal matters, over Indians belonging to the same tribe, was specifically recognized by the Act of May 2, 1890,²⁹ which provided for a temporary government for the Territory of Oklahoma and enlarged the jurisdiction of the United States court in the Indian Territory.

Under sections 30 and 31 of this act, the exclusive jurisdiction preserved to the judicial tribunals of the Indian nations in all civil and criminal cases is limited to those cases in which "members of said Nations" are the sole parties, which creates an ambiguity as to the meaning of the words "only parties" or "sole parties." This ambiguity, however, was dispelled by the Supreme Court in the case of *Albert v. United States*³⁰ in this connection the court said:

The real question as respects the jurisdiction in this case is as to the meaning of the words "sole" or "only

"parties." These words are obviously susceptible of two interpretations. They may mean a class of actions as to which there is but one party; but as these actions, if they exist at all, are very rare, it can hardly be supposed that Congress intended to legislate with respect to them to the exclusion of the much more numerous actions to which there are two parties. They may mean actions to which members of the Nations are the sole or only parties, to the exclusion of white men, or persons other than members of the Nation; and as respects civil cases at least, this seems the more probable construction. (P. 538.)

Under section 6 of the Act of March 1, 1890,³¹ creating the United States court in the Indian Territory, that court had jurisdiction of a suit brought by a citizen of the United States who had become a member and citizen of the Chickasaw Nation against another citizen of that nation.³²

The termination of the authority of the tribal courts of the Five Civilized Tribes is elsewhere discussed.³³

A typical provision of a contemporary Indian code relating to civil jurisdiction is the following provision from the tribal code of the Rosebud tribe:³⁴

The Superior Courts of the Rosebud Sioux Tribe shall have jurisdiction of all suits wherein the defendant is a member of the tribe or tribes within their jurisdiction, and of all other suits between members and non-members which are brought before the Courts by stipulation of both parties. * * *

In general, tribes which have not adopted ordinances of their own on the subject and which have Courts of Indian Offenses, are governed by the following regulation of the Department of the Interior:³⁵

The Courts of Indian Offenses shall have jurisdiction of all suits wherein the defendant is a member of the tribe or tribes within their jurisdiction, and of all other suits between members and non-members which are brought before the Courts by stipulation of both parties. * * *

Judgments in civil cases rendered by Courts of Indian Offenses may be satisfied out of restricted Indian moneys at the order of the Secretary of the Interior, and such judgments are considered lawful debts in probate proceedings held by the Interior Department or by Courts of Indian Offenses.³⁶

The peculiarities of federal Indian law with respect to the Pueblos of New Mexico arise primarily from the peculiar status which was accorded to the Pueblos under Spanish and Mexican law. It is necessary, therefore, in order to understand the present legal status of these Pueblos to allude to certain basic principles developed prior to the acquisition of New Mexico by the United States.

SECTION 1. STATUS OF PUEBLOS UNDER SPANISH LAW

When the Spaniards entered the Rio Grande Valley in the sixteenth century they found certain Indian groups or communities living in villages and these Indians they designated "Indios Naturales" or "Indios de los Pueblos" to distinguish them from the "Indios Barbaros," by which term the nomadic and wandering Indians of the region were designated. The Indians who were called Pueblo Indians were not of a single tribe and they had no common organization or language. Each village maintained its own government, its own irrigation system, and its own closely integrated community life.

From an early date the Spanish Government enacted legislation to protect the lands of the Pueblos from trespass. Grants were made to the individual Pueblos for the purpose of defining and protecting the boundaries of pueblo lands. The general practice developed of fixing Pueblo boundaries at one league in each of the cardinal directions from the central church. Thus each grant normally comprised 4 square leagues or 17,712 acres. The policy of the Spanish Government towards the Pueblo Indians of New Mexico is set forth and documented in a recent study of "Pueblo Indian Land Grants of the 'Rio Abajo,' New Mexico" (1938) by Herbert O. Beyer of the University of New Mexico,² from which the following summary of the status of the Pueblos is excerpted:

- 1 The Pueblo Indians of New Mexico were considered wards of the Spanish crown.
- 2 The fundamental legal basis for the Pueblo land grants lies in the royal ordinances. The 1688 grants, purporting to convey land to the Indians, are spurious.
- 3 Only the viceroy, governors, and captains-general could make grants to the Indians, and only these officials had the authority to validate sales of land by the Indians.
- 4 All non-Indians were expressly forbidden to reside upon Pueblo lands.
- 5 The Spanish Government provided legal advice, protection, and defense for the Indians. Provincial officials had the authority to appeal cases directly to the audiences in Mexico.
- 6 The Spanish had prior water rights to all streams, rivers, and other waters which crossed or bordered their lands.
- 7 The Pueblo Indians held their lands in common, the land being granted to the Indians in the name of their pueblo.

The most important of the Spanish laws governing the Pueblo Indians are the Act of March 21, 1561,³ providing that the Indians should not live separated in the mountains, deprived of spiritual and temporal benefits, but should all be brought to

¹The phrase "Pueblos of New Mexico" is commonly used to designate the Rio Grande Pueblos, which at the present time, comprise Acoma, Cochiti, Isleta, Jemez, Laguna, Nambé, Pojoaque, Picuris, Sandia, San Felipe, San Ildefonso, San Juan, Santa Ana, Santa Clara, Santo Domingo, Taos, Tewa, and Zia.

The Zuni Indians of New Mexico and the Hopi Indians of Arizona are classed as Pueblo Indians, anthropologically, but administratively and politically they have frequently been excluded from rules and laws applicable to the Rio Grande Pueblos. For this reason they are not considered within the scope of this chapter except as particularly noted.

The Pueblo of Pecos, nearly extinct in fact, was merged with the Pueblo of Jemez by the Act of June 19, 1895, 49 Stat. 1828. A similar legislative merger of the Pueblos of Pojoaque and Nambé was recommended in a report on the "Status of Pueblo of Pojoaque" submitted on November 8, 1923, by George A. H. Fraser, Special Attorney live in villages (Pueblos); the Acts of December 1, 1873, and October 10, 1818,⁴ defining the areas and rights of the Pueblos; the royal cedula of June 4, 1887, authorizing the viceroy and president of the royal audiencia to define the areas of land granted to the Indians and increasing the amounts hitherto granted, which is in turn amended so as to reduce the areas in question, by the royal cedula of July 12, 1865, the statute⁵ requiring sales of land and of personal property by Indians to be made before a judge with prescribed formalities, the decree of February 23, 1781, prohibiting unlicensed sales of real property by Indians; the decree of January 6, 1811, for the protection of Indians in their person and property, and Decree XI of February 9, 1811, guaranteeing to the Indian and Spanish residents of New Spain full political equality with the European Spaniards.⁶

that are dealt with by Congress in the Pueblo Lands Act of June 7, 1924.⁷ The Indians complain that the areas of land granted them by the central government are infringed upon by their non-Indian neighbors. The non-Indian neighbors claim that lands which they have acquired and improved in good faith are subsequently claimed by the Indians. The central government is grieved to find that white ranch owners "are encroaching upon the lands of the latter (Indians), taking the same away from them, either by fraud or violence, by reason of the poor Indians abandoning their houses and settlements, this being what the Spaniards long for and aim at."⁸ Through the language of all the laws and decrees enacted for the protection of the Indians there runs an implicit recognition that past laws to achieve this protection have not been adequately enforced, and the implicit hope that more adequate enforcement will attend the new legislation.

SECTION 2. THE PUEBLOS UNDER MEXICAN RULE

The status of the Indian under Mexican rule is well summarized in the opinion of the Supreme Court of the Territory of New Mexico, in Territory v. Delinquent Taxpayers.⁹ In that case the court, after noting that the Pueblo Indians "seem to have been considered by the Spanish as wards of the government, and entitled to special privileges and protection," went on to declare, per Parker, et al.:

But a complete change took place in the status of these people when Mexico threw off the Spanish yoke. Among those engaged in that struggle for independence, this Aztec race far outnumbered the Mexicans and its success was due in a large measure to their efforts. It was but natural and fitting that in the formation of the new government they should take a prominent, if not a leading, part, and that they should be placed upon an equal footing as to all civil and political rights. And so we find that the revolutionary government of Mexico, February 24, 1821, a short time before the subversion of Spanish power, adopted what is known as "The Plan of Iguala" (Iguala was the place of the revolutionary army headquarters), in which it is declared that: "All the inhabitants of New Spain, without distinction, whether European, African or Indian, are citizens of this monarchy, with the right to be employed in any post according to their merit and virtues;" and that: "The person and property of every citizen will be respected and protected by the government." 1 Ordenes y Decretos, by Galvan, page 8; U. S. v. Ritchie, 17 How. (U. S.) 624, 638; U. S. v. Lucero, supra [1 N. M. 422 (1899)].

The same principles were reaffirmed in the Treaty of Cordova, of August 24, 1821. 1 Ordenes y Decretos, by Galvan, page 9, and in the Declaration of Independence, of October 6, 1821, id. page 8.

The Mexican congress thereafter followed with at least four acts in each of which "The Plan of Iguala" was uniformly considered as a fixed principle of Mexican law. U. S. v. Ritchie, supra; 2 Ordenes y Decretos, pages 1 and 92, and 3 id. page 68.

This latter act was passed August 18, 1824, only twenty-four years before the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, whereby we acquired this Territory and these people. (Pp. 142-148).

The United States Supreme Court in United States v. Ritchie,¹⁰ in 1854, commented on the foregoing Mexican statutes in the following terms, per Nelson, J.:

The Indian race having participated largely in the struggle resulting in the overthrow of the Spanish power, and in the erection of an independent government, it was natural that in laying the foundations of the new government, the previous political and social distinctions in favor of the European or Spanish blood should be abolished, and equality of rights and privileges established. Hence the article to this effect in the plan of Iguala, and the decree of the first Congress declaring the equality of civil rights, whites or may be their race or country. These solemn declarations of the political power of the government had the effect, necessarily, to invest the Indians with the privileges of citizenship as effectually as had the declaration of independence of the United States of 1776, to invest all those persons with these privileges residing in the country at the time, and who adhered to the interests of the colonies. 3 Pet. 99, 121.¹¹

The historian Brayer presents persuasive evidence¹² that the grant of citizenship to the Pueblo Indians, under Mexican rule, did not dissolve the status of wardship or the limitations upon land alienation established under Spanish sovereignty. It would be beyond the scope of this work to enter into this controversial field of historical research, but the conclusions of the historian cited are worthy of notice.

1 That the Pueblo Indians of New Mexico were still considered wards of the government even though they were given the title "citizens."

2. Only the most important of the government officials could authorize the sale of Indian lands. That the local officials in New Mexico continued to exercise the same powers as they had during the Spanish regime throughout the entire period of Mexican sovereignty.

3 That the Spanish laws in force previous to 1821, relative to the Pueblo Indian and to land policy, remained in full force.

4. That because of the laxity on the part of local officials during the Mexican period a great many non-Indians were able to obtain holdings on Indian lands. The legality of such holdings needs little consideration, but the failure of the Mexican government to take action left the problem up to the United States after 1848.

5. That the title to the Pueblo lands remained in the name of the individual Pueblo, and that no individual Indian held the title to any portion thereof.¹³

SECTION 3. THE PUEBLOS UNDER THE NEW MEXICAN TERRITORIAL GOVERNMENT

By Article 8 of the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo,¹⁰ the residents of the territory ceded by Mexico were given the option of retaining their Mexican citizenship by declaring such intention within a year from the date of exchange of ratifications,

* * * and those who shall remain in the said territories after the expiration of that year, without having declared their intention to retain the character of Mexicans, shall be considered to have elected to become citizens of the United States

None of the Pueblo Indians elected to retain Mexican citizenship, according to the opinion in the Lugo case

Colonel Washington made proclamation requiring the people to elect by signing a declaration before the clerk of the courts in the different districts, if they wished to retain the title and rights of Mexican citizens. In that test, which is a public printed document, the name is not found of a single Pueblo Indian, and hence, by the express terms of the eighth article of the treaty, they became citizens of the United States, as they were previously citizens of the Mexican republic (P 440)

While the conclusion that the Pueblo Indians thus became citizens of the United States cannot be considered free from doubt, in view of the comment¹¹ of the Supreme Court in United States v. San donal, "it remains an open question whether they have become citizens," it would appear that the historical evidence supports the claim that the Pueblo Indians did enjoy citizenship, both under Mexican and under United States rule.¹² It seems clear, in any event, that, as Mexicans, they were protected by section 9 of the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo which promised, eventually, "all the rights of citizens of the United States" and, immediately, "free enjoyment of their liberty and property."¹³

A HISTORY OF PUEBLO LEGISLATION

For several years following the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, Congress apparently took little notice of the Pueblo Indians. Until 1864, at least, the local authorities appear to have legislated in pueblo matters with such congressional approval as was given by silence. The course of this local legislation was thus summarized by the Chief Justice of the territorial supreme court, in United States v. Lucero:¹⁴

* * * General Kearny, after taking possession of New Mexico, eighteen of August, 1846, established a system of civil government in New Mexico, organized courts, appointed judges, and convened a legislative body, and in December, 1847, that legislative assembly passed the following act

"INDIANS

"SECTION 1 That the inhabitants within the territory of New Mexico, known by the name of pueblo Indians, and living in towns or villages built on lands granted to such Indians by the laws of Spain and Mexico, and conceding to such inhabitants certain lands and privileges to be used for the common benefit, are severally hereby created and constituted bodies politic and corporate, and shall be known in the law by the name of the pueblo de ——— (naming it) and by that name they and their successors shall have perpetual succession, sue and be sued, plead and be impleaded, bring and defend in any court of law or equity all such actions, pleas, and matters whatsoever proper to recover, protect, reclaim, demand, or assert the right of such inhabitants, or any individual thereof, to any lands, tenements, or hereditaments possessed, occupied, or claimed, contrary to law, by any person whatever, and to bring and defend all such actions, and to testify any encroachment, claim or trespass made upon such lands, tenements, or hereditaments belonging to said inhabitants, or any individual." See Compiled Laws of New Mexico, 470

On the tenth of January, 1868, a law was passed, prohibiting the sale of liquor to Indians, with a proviso, "that the pueblo Indians that live among us are not included in the word Indian." See Compiled Laws, p 472, sec 5 January 21, 1861, an act was passed, requiring the pueblos of Indians to work acequias (ditches) and highways, and extending the act of January 18, 1860, over the pueblo Indians as to trespasses of their stock on the fields of their neighbors. See Id 470, 471. On the sixteenth of February, 1861, the legislative assembly of New Mexico passed the following act, section 70 "That the pueblo Indians of this territory for the present, and until they shall be declared by the congress of the United States to have the right, are excluded from the privilege of voting at the popular elections of the territory, except in the elections for overseers of ditches to which they belong, and in the elections proper to their own pueblos to elect their officers according to their ancient customs." The seventh section of the organic act of September 9, 1850, invests the legislative assembly of New Mexico with the power to legislate upon all rightful subjects of legislation consistent with the constitution of the United States and the provisions of that act, and further provided that "all laws passed by the legislative assembly and governor, shall be submitted to the congress of the United States, and if disapproved, shall be null and of no effect."

As this act of the sixteenth of February, 1864, passed by the legislative assembly of New Mexico, has never been disapproved by congress, it must be regarded as in force in New Mexico, and deprives the pueblo Indians of one of the dearest and most valued rights, the right to be heard by their ballots in the selection of agents to make laws for their government. (P 488-440)

By the Act of July 22, 1864, Congress provided for the appointment of a Surveyor-General for New Mexico who was, "under such instructions as may be given by the Secretary of the Interior, to ascertain the origin, nature, character, and extent of all claims to lands under the laws, usages, and customs of Spain and Mexico; * * * shall also make a report in regard to all pueblos existing in the Territory, showing the extent and locality of each, stating the number of inhabitants in the said pueblos, respectively, and the nature of their titles to the land." (P 806) This reference to "Pueblos" has no distinction between Indian Pueblos and non-Indian Pueblos.

The Pueblo Indians are mentioned in the annual Indian Department Appropriation Acts of August 30, 1862,¹⁵ and July 31, 1864.¹⁶ The former of these acts contains this item:

For defraying expenses incident to the visit of the Pueblo Indians and their attendants from New Mexico to Washington, and to defray their expenses to their homes, the sum of seven thousand five hundred dollars. (P 55)

The second of the acts cited contains a provision:

For the expenses of making presents of agricultural implements and farming utensils to the bands of Pueblo Indians in the territory of New Mexico, ten thousand dollars * * * (P 893).

The Pueblo Indians are next mentioned by Congress in the Indian Department Appropriation Act of March 3, 1837,¹¹ which contains this provision:

For expenses of surveying and marking the external boundaries of Indian pueblos, in the Territory of New Mexico, three thousand seven hundred and fifty dollars. (P. 184.)

On December 22, 1838, Congress acted favorably upon the report of the Surveyor-General for the territory of New Mexico, confirming pueblo land claims of the following Pueblos: Jemez, Acoma, San Juan, Picuris, San Felipe, Pecos, Cochiti, Santo Domingo, Taos, Santa Clara, Tesuque, San Ildefonso, Pojanque, Zia, Sandia, Ileta, and Nambé.¹²

This congressional confirmation of pueblo titles is subject to the usual proviso "That this confirmation shall only be construed as a relinquishment of all title and claim of the United States to any of said lands, and shall not affect any adverse valid rights, should such exist."

To the foregoing list of confirmed pueblo claims there was added, in 1839, the claim of the Pueblo of Santa Ana.¹³ Many years later, a similar patent was issued to the Zuni Pueblo Indians.¹⁴

All that the United States could give was a quit-claim deed, transferring to the Pueblo Indians its own share, it could not transfer property from one private owner to another.

The courts of the United States would always have the right, on due consideration of all the facts involved, to determine the actual ownership of any given piece of land. But it has never been within the power of either the legislature or the executive to change private land titles. The judicial power alone could settle the question of the encroachments upon the lands of the Pueblo Indians—encroachments dating back for centuries, arising partly from greed, partly from interrelationship, partly from the need of a common defense against "Indios barbaros." Some of these settlers outside the pueblo walls claimed title from Mexican and Spanish grants, and the Pueblos themselves; some had obtained their land by purchase from the Indian communities, some were intruders pure and simple, no doubt, some, beginning with a valid title, had skillfully enlarged their holdings by less defensible means. All these problems came as an unhappy heritage to the new government of the land.¹⁵

In the Appropriation Act of July 15, 1870,¹⁶ a sum is appropriated "to be expended in establishing schools among the Pueblo Indians," and similar provisions reappear in later acts.

In the Act of May 29, 1872,¹⁷ the Indian Department Appropriation Act for 1873, and regularly in succeeding appropriation acts,¹⁸ provision is made for pay of an Indian agent at the Pueblo Agency. Thereafter congressional appropriations for the work of the Indian Department among the Pueblo Indians of New Mexico are gradually elaborated.

In the Indian Department Appropriation Act for 1875,¹⁹ and in subsequent appropriation acts, provision is made for pay of interpreters at the Pueblo agency.

The Appropriation Act for 1883²⁰ contains the following provision embodying the first assumption of federal responsibility for "civilizing" the Pueblo Indians:

For civilization and instruction of the Pueblo Indians of New Mexico, including pay of teachers and purchase of seeds and agricultural implements, seven thousand five hundred dollars; and of this sum not exceeding one thousand five hundred dollars may, in the discretion of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, be used in constructing irrigating ditches at Zuni and Jemez Pueblos. (P. 88.)

The foregoing provision is substantially repeated in subsequent Indian Department appropriation acts.²¹

The next addition to the scope of congressional responsibility for the Pueblo Indians appears in the appropriation act for 1890,²² which establishes the post of "special attorney for the Pueblo Indians of New Mexico" by virtue of the following provision:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to employ a special attorney for the Pueblo Indians of New Mexico, one thousand five hundred dollars.

This provision is renewed, in substance, in succeeding appropriation acts.²³

The Appropriation Act of March 3, 1905, for the fiscal year 1906 contains the following item of permanent legislation, called forth, apparently, by the decision of the New Mexico Territorial Court rendered on March 3, 1904, in the case of Territory v. Delinquent Tesuques:²⁴

That the lands now held by the various villages or pueblos of Pueblo Indians, or by individual members thereof, within Pueblo reservations or lands, in the Territory of New Mexico, and all personal property furnished said Indians by the United States, or used in cultivating said lands, and any cattle and sheep now possessed or that may hereafter be acquired by said Indians shall be free and exempt from taxation of any sort whatsoever, including taxes hereinafter levied; if any, until Congress shall otherwise provide. (P. 1060.)²⁵

Up to the admission of New Mexico to statehood, there is no further federal legislation for the Pueblo Indians of that state except in the Indian Department appropriation acts (redesignated, beginning with the Act of April 4, 1910,²⁶ as the Bureau of Indian Affairs appropriation acts). These acts include special appropriations for irrigation for the Zuni Pueblo,²⁷ and for the building of two bridges across the Rio Grande at or near Ileta and San Felipe Indian Pueblos, with preference given to Indian labor.²⁸

B. HISTORY OF JUDICIAL AND EXECUTIVE ATTITUDES TOWARDS PUEBLOS

During the period which the foregoing history of federal legislation covers, judicial and executive attitudes towards the Pueblos were undergoing a gradual change parallel to the gradual increase in the activities of the Indian Bureau among the Pueblo Indians.

For many years after the accession of New Mexico the Pueblos were not considered Indian tribes within the meaning of existing statutes. During the 28 years that elapsed between the Treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo and the Act of March 3, 1871,¹⁰ which terminated the practice of making treaties with Indian tribes, no treaty was ever negotiated with any of the Pueblos. The reasons for distinguishing between the Pueblo Indians and other aborigines are set forth at length and in colorful terms by the Supreme Court of New Mexico Territory, in the case of United States v. Lucero,¹¹ decided in January 1889. That case involved an attempt by the United States to invoke section 11 of the Indian Intercourse Act¹² of June 30, 1834, which made unauthorized settlement of tribal lands a federal offense, as excluded by section 7 of the Appropriation Act of February 27, 1861,¹³ over the Indian tribes in the Territories of New Mexico and Utah.

The territorial court dismissed the suit on demurrer, declaring, per Watkin, C J:

" * * * If these pueblos, twenty-one in number, were really included in the provisions of the intercourse act, intended for a different class of Indians, the Indian department, during the last twenty years that they have been under their pretended control, would have had spread upon our statutes at large certainly not less than eighty treaties with these twenty-one quasi nations (P 437)."

" * * * It will thus be seen by a reference to the acts of congress above cited, that no person has ever been authorized by congress to be appointed agent for the pueblo Indians, nor has any one ever been commissioned as agent for them, and the designation of an agent for the pueblos by the Indian department is without any authority at congress or the decision of any judicial tribunal authorized to pass upon the question, and the transfer of eight thousand of the most honest, industrious, and law-abiding citizens of New Mexico to the provisions of a code of laws made for savages, by the simple stroke of the pen of an Indian commissioner, will never be assented to by congress or the judicial tribunals of the country so long as solemn treaties and human laws afford any protection to the liberty and property of the citizens (P 438)."

After reviewing the history of territorial legislation with regard to the pueblo Indians of New Mexico, the court continued:

" * * * it is the right and duty of the courts to see that every citizen of the Territory of New Mexico, in conformity with the ninth article of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, "shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty and property, and secured in the free exercise of their religion without restriction."

This court, under this section of the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, does not consider it proper to assent to the withdrawal of eight thousand citizens of New Mexico from the operation of the laws, made to secure and maintain them in their liberty and property, and consign their liberty and property to a system of laws and trade made for wandering savages and administered by the agents of the Indian department. If such a destiny is in store for a large number of the most law-abiding, sober, and industrious people of New Mexico, it must be the result of the direct legislation of congress or the mandate of the supreme court. That court feels itself incompetent to consign them into any such condition. Thus court has known the conduct and habits of these Indians for eighteen or twenty years, and we say, without the fear of successful contradiction, that you may pick out one thousand of the best Americans in New Mexico, and one thousand of the best Mexicans in New Mexico, and one thousand of the worst pueblo Indians, and there will be found less, vastly less, murder, robbery, theft, or other crimes among the thousand of the worst pueblo Indians than among the thousand of the worst Mexicans or Americans in New Mexico. The associate justice now beside me, Hon. Joab Houghton, has been judge and lawyer in this territory for over twenty years, and the chief justice for over seventeen years, and during all that time not twenty pueblo Indians have been brought before the courts in all New Mexico, accused of violation of the criminal laws of this territory. For the Indian department to insist, as they have done for the last fifteen years, upon the reduction of these citizens to a state of vassalage, under the Indian intercourse act, in passing strange laws made for wild, wandering savages, to be extended over a people living for three centuries in fenced abodes and cultivating the soil for the maintenance of themselves and families, and giving an example of virtue, honesty, and industry to their more civilized neighbors, in this enlightened age of progress and proper understanding of the civil rights of man, is considered by this court as wholly incompatible to the pueblo Indians of New Mexico (Pp 441-442).

It has already been shown that the people of Cochiti are a corporate body, and that a full and ample remedy is given them to protect and defend their title to their individual and common lands, and that they do not need any assistance from the penal statutes of the United States to accomplish that purpose. " * * * let the Indian department have pinned under their control the twenty-one pueblos of New Mexico, and get the laws of trade and intercourse, designed to regulate the commerce of the country with savages, extended over these peaceful and industrious citizens, and in less than six months they will have fifty lawsuits on hand about questions settled by a former government fifty years ago (Pp 444-445)."

One of the grounds of the Lucero decision was demolished when the Appropriation Act of May 20, 1872,¹⁴ made provision for an agent for "the Pueblo agency," thus treating the Pueblos on a parity with other tribes. The United States thereupon renewed the effort that had been defeated by the Lucero decision, to invoke the Act of June 30, 1834, for the protection of pueblo lands against trespass. Again the territorial court denied the applicability of the statute to the Pueblos,¹⁵ and this time the United States took an appeal to the Supreme Court. The Supreme Court, in United States v. Joseph,¹⁶ affirmed the decision of the territorial court, offering these reasons for its holding:

The character and history of these people are not obscure, but occupy a well-known page in the story of Mexico, from the conquest of the country by Cortes to the cessation of this part of it to the United States by the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo. The subject is tampering and full of interest, but we have only space for a few well-considered sentences of the opinion of the chief justice of the court whose judgment we are reviewing.

"For centuries," he says, "the pueblo Indians have lived in villages, in fixed communities, each having its own municipal or local government. As far as their history can be traced, they have been a pastoral and agricultural people, raising flocks and cultivating the soil. Since the introduction of the Spanish Catholic missionary into the country, they have adopted many of the customs and language, but the religion of a Christian church in every pueblo is erected a church, dedicated to the worship of God, according to the form of the Roman Catholic religion, and in nearly all cases found a priest of this church, who is recognized as their spiritual guide and adviser. They manufacture nearly all of their blankets, clothing, agricultural and culinary implements, &c. Integrity and virtue among them is fostered and encouraged. They are as intelligent as most nations of people deprived of means or facilities for education. Their names, their customs, their habits, all similar to those of the people in whose midst they reside, or in the midst of whom their pueblos are situated. The criminal records of the courts of the Territory scarcely contain the name of a pueblo Indian. In short, they are a peaceable, industrious, intelligent, honest, and virtuous people. They are Indians only in feature, complexion, and a few of their habits, in all other respects superior to all but a few of the civilized Indian tribes of the country, and the equal of the most civilized thereof. This description of the pueblo Indians, I think, will be deemed by all who know them as faithful and true in all respects. Such was their character at the time of the acquisition of New Mexico by the United States, such is their character now."

At the time the act of 1824 was passed there were no such Indians as these in the United States, unless it be one or two reservations or tribes, such as the Senecas or Oneidas of New York, to whom, it is clear, the eleventh section of the statute could have no application. (Pp 610-611.)

The tribes for whom the act of 1824 was made were those semi-independent tribes whom our government has always recognized as exempt from our laws, whether within or without the limits of an organized State or Territory, and, in regard to their domestic government, left to their own rules and traditions; in whom we have recognized the capacity to make treaties, and with whom the governments, state and national, deal, with a few exceptions only, in their national or tribal character, and not as individuals.

If the pueblo Indians differ from the other inhabitants of New Mexico in holding lands in common, and in a certain patriarchal form of domestic life, they only resemble in this regard the Shakers and other communistic societies in this country, and cannot for that reason be classed with the Indian tribes of whom we have been speaking.

We have been urged by counsel, in view of these considerations, to declare that they are citizens of the United States and of New Mexico. But abiding by the rule which we think ought always to govern this court, to decide nothing beyond what is necessary to the judgment we are to render, we leave that question until it shall be made in some case where the rights of citizenship are necessarily involved. But we have no hesitation in saying that their status is not, in the face of the facts we have stated, to be determined solely by the circumstance that some officer of the government has appointed for them an agent, even if we could take judicial notice of the existence of that fact, suggested to us in argument.

Turning our attention to the tenure by which these communities hold the land on which the settlement of defendant was made, we find that it is wholly different from that of the Indian tribes to whom the act of Congress applies. The United States have not recognized in these latter any other than a passing title with right of use, until by treaty or otherwise that right is extinguished. And the ultimate title has been always held to be in the United States, with no right in the Indian to transfer it, or even their possession, without consent of the government.

It is this fixed claim of dominion which lies at the foundation of the act forbidding the white man to make a settlement on the lands occupied by an Indian tribe.

The pueblo Indians, on the contrary, hold their lands by a right superior to that of the United States. Their title dates back to grants made by the government of Spain before the Mexican revolution, a title which was fully recognized by the Mexican government, and protected by it in the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo, by which this country and the allegiance of its inhabitants were transferred to the United States. (Pp. 617-618.)

If the defendant is on the lands of the pueblo, without the consent of the inhabitants, he may be ejected, or punished civilly by a suit for trespass, according to the laws regulating such matters in the Territory. If he is there with their consent or license, we know of no injury which the United States suffers by his presence, nor any statute which he violates in that regard. (P. 619.)

Some years later, the Supreme Court would ascribe the views expressed in 1878 in the Joseph case to inaccurate information," but for nearly four decades the Joseph case fixed the law governing the New Mexico Pueblos."

In 1801, the Attorney General ruled "that federal statutes authorizing the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to license and regulate Indian traders" had no application to the Pueblos.

In 1804, the Assistant Attorney General for the Department of the Interior ruled that laws relating to the approval of leases of Indian tribal land had no application to the Pueblos."

In 1900, in the case of Pueblo of Nambé v. Romero,²⁰ the territorial court, in a suit to quiet title brought by an alleged conveyee of pueblo lands, issued a decree against the Pueblo, basing such decree upon a finding that the Pueblo had validly granted away the land in question and upon a holding that the territorial statute of limitations²¹ ran against the Pueblo.

In 1904, in the case of Territory of New Mexico v. Delinquent Taxpayers,²² the attempt to collect taxes on pueblo lands was upheld by the territorial court on the basis of the reasoning in the Luzco and Joseph cases. This ruling, however, as we have seen, was reversed by congressional enactment.²³

In 1907, in United States v. Mason,²⁴ the territorial court held that the Pueblo Indians were not covered by Indian liquor laws "making it an offense to sell or give intoxicants to 'any Indian to whom allotment of land has been made while the title to the same shall be held in trust by the government, or to any Indian a ward of the government under charge of any Indian superintendent or agent, or any Indian, including mixed bloods, over whom the government, through its departments, exercises guardianship.'"

This ruling, again, was reversed by Congress, in the New Mexico Enabling Act, which will be treated in the following section.

By way of summary, it may be said that during the period from the accession of New Mexico to the granting of statehood, the Pueblos had a legal status sharply distinguished from that of most other Indian tribes and comprehended under Indian legislation only where Congress had expressly so provided, as in the matter of agency maintenance, "civilization" appropriations, and tax exemption. In all other respects, each Pueblo had a status substantially similar to that of any other municipal corporation of the territory."

²¹ The effect of this decision was to confirm the opinions and judgment that had before that time been rendered with respect to the Pueblo Indians. As they were further advanced in civilization than the nomadic tribes, better versed in the arts and industries of ordinary life, so they were recognized as deserving the treatment accorded to civilized and industrious people. But with the greater freedom and privilege of their status went a greater responsibility. If their land was their own they must use their own judgment in the disposition of it. The Supreme Court had decided that the United States had no right to interfere.

For decades, the territorial court had, through many years, the decision went unchallenged. The Pueblo governors managed the lands of their people as they had been done, and back of every sale was the assurance of the Supreme Court that they had a perfect and complete right to make it. SECTION 4. THE PUEBLOS IN THE STATE OF NEW MEXICO

While New Mexico was a territory and thus an agency of the Federal Government there was a tendency to leave to the territorial government control of the Pueblos, and the territorial authorities sought generally to assimilate the Pueblos to the status of other municipal corporations of the territory. This tendency, as we have seen, was checked in the matter of taxation, but in all other respects the relation of the Pueblos to the federal executive was extremely tenuous.

With the admission of New Mexico to statehood, however, a sharp reversal occurred in these tendencies. The termination of the territorial government created a clear distinction between state and federal authority and the center of control over the Pueblos shifted from Santa Fe to Washington. Thus the Pueblos came to be treated more and more as other Indian tribes.

The first important step in this direction was taken in the New Mexico Enabling Act, which contained a specific provision that "the terms 'Indian' and 'Indian country' shall include the Pueblo Indians of New Mexico and the lands now owned or occupied by them."

A. THE SANDOVAL DECISION

The constitutionality of this extension of federal control over the Pueblos was upheld in 1913 in the case of United States v. Sandoval.¹ That case involved a prosecution for the offense of introducing liquor into the Indian country. The Supreme Court held that Congress had expressed a clear intent to reverse the rule laid down by the territorial court in United States v. Hayes.² On the question of the constitutionality of this extension of federal control, the court pointed out that neither the outright ownership of land by the Pueblos nor the claim of the Pueblo Indians to citizenship (the validity of which was not here passed upon) stood as an obstacle to the exercise of federal guardianship by Congress. The court declared, per Van Devanter, J.

Of course, it is not meant by this that Congress may bring a community or body of people within the range of

Sec. 2 . . . that . . . the said convention shall be, and is hereby, authorized to form a constitution and provide for a state government for said proposed State, all in the manner and under the conditions contained in this Act.

And said convention shall provide, by an ordinance irrevocable without the consent of the United States and the people of said State—

First, That . . . the sale, barter, or giving of intoxicating liquors to Indians and the introduction of liquor into Indian country, which term shall also include all lands now owned or occupied by the Pueblo Indians of New Mexico, are forever prohibited.

Second, That the people inhabiting said proposed State do agree and declare that they forever disclaim all right and title . . . to all lands lying within said boundaries owned or held by any Indian or Indian tribe the right of title to which shall have been acquired through or from the United States or any prior sovereignty, and that said title of such Indian or Indian tribe shall have been extinguished the same shall be and remain subject to the disposition and under the absolute jurisdiction and control of the Congress of the United States. . . . but nothing herein, or in the ordinance herein provided for, shall preclude the said State from taxing, as other lands and other property are taxed, any lands and other property outside of an Indian reservation owned or held by any Indian or Indian tribe, or any lands that have been granted or acquired as aforesaid or as may be granted or confirmed to any Indian or Indians under any act of Congress; but said ordinance shall provide that all such lands shall be exempt from taxation by said State so long and to such extent as Congress has so declared or may hereafter prescribe.

Third, That whenever hereafter any of the lands contained within Indian reservation or as aforesaid in said proposed State shall be allotted, sold, reserved, or otherwise disposed of, they shall be subject for a period of twenty-five years after said allotment, sale, reservation, or otherwise disposed of to all the laws of the United States prohibiting the introduction of liquor into the Indian country. . . . The terms "Indian" and "Indian country" shall include the Pueblo Indians of New Mexico and the lands now owned or occupied by them.

this power by arbitrarily calling them an Indian tribe, but only that in respect of distinctly Indian communities the questions whether, to what extent, and for what time they shall be recognized and dealt with as dependent tribes requiring the guardianship and protection of the United States are to be determined by Congress, and not by the courts. (P. 46.)

We are not unmindful that in United States v. Joseph, 94 U. S. 614, there are some observations not in accord with what is here said of these Indians, but as that case did not turn upon the power of Congress over them or their property, but upon the interpretation and purpose of a statute not nearly so comprehensive as the legislation now before us, and as the observation there made respecting the Pueblos were evidently based upon statements in the opinion of the territorial court, then under review, which are at variance with other recognized sources of information, now available, and with the long-continued action of the legislative and executive departments, that case cannot be regarded as holding that these Indians or their lands are beyond the range of Congressional power under the Constitution. (Pp. 45-49.)

B. EFFECT OF THE SANDOVAL DECISION

The effect of the Sandoval decision was to spread consternation among the people of New Mexico who held lands to which the Pueblos laid claim. The situation is thus described in a letter to the Attorney General, dated June 11, 1920, from George A. H. Fraser, who served for some years as special assistant to the Attorney General:

The great majority of the claimants had bought and possessed their lands in good faith and in reliance on a series of decisions of the Territorial Supreme Court of New Mexico, beginning in 1860 and extending to about 1908, to the general effect that the Pueblo Indians were extinguished, that they had the right to sell their lands and the liability of losing them by adverse possession, and that the Nonintercourse Act of 1834 did not apply to them. The last-mentioned idea was supported by the Joseph case in 94 U. S. decided in 1877, in which the United States was defeated in an attempt to remove settlers from the Pueblo of Taos under the provisions of said Act. Up to 1913, therefore, when the Sandoval case was decided (221 U. S. 28), all the law there was, including that announced by the highest tribunal, was to the effect aforesaid. The Sandoval decision came as a great surprise, and it was natural that any proceedings interfering with titles so long supposed to be valid should be resisted in every possible way.

Heubert O. Beyer, author of the leading history of pueblo land grants,³ comments on the Sandoval decision in these terms:

From the Sandoval decision, in 1913, to the passage of the Pueblo lands act of 1924, every possible means to evade the consequences of the supreme court decision was utilized by those non-Indians who were in possession of Pueblo lands.

³ Leo Crane, Desert Drums (Boston, 1925), 275-311.

The constant friction between the non-Indian claimants and the Pueblo Indians finally culminated in an investigation by the sixty-seventh congress. This investigation disclosed that there were approximately three thousand non-Indian claimants to lands within the exterior boundaries of the Pueblo grants. It was estimated that these three thousand claimants represented families aggregating twelve thousand persons. With the seriousness of the situation impressed upon them by these figures, congress began to seek a remedy for the situation. Senator Helen O. Bannum of New Mexico introduced into the senate of the sixty-seventh congress a bill entitled, "An act to quiet title to lands within Pueblo Indian land grants and for other purposes." On the surface the bill seemed to be just what was needed, a close study of the Bursum bill disclosed, however, that it would have served to place the non-Indian holders of Indian land in a favorable position to obtain a clear title to holdings within the Pueblo grants, and to have put the burden of disproving the right of these private land holders upon the government. This would have entirely reversed the usual procedure with regard to land claims. [The burden of proof in such cases is always upon the claimant.] One authority, suitably biased in favor of the Indians, distinctly charges an attempt on the part of Senator Bursum and the secretary of the Interior, at that time, Albert B. Fall of New Mexico, to provide an easy means by which the non-Indian holders could make certain of obtaining a title to their lands which would be forever secure.

The Bursum bill received the backing of the Harding administration and seemed slated for enactment. To the defense of the Indians, and to the attack on the Bursum proposal, a strong opposition developed, led by two groups, the small New Mexico association on Indian affairs and the general federation of women's clubs. The latter organization, in 1921, had formed a committee on Indian welfare. Under the leadership of Mrs. Stella M. Atwood, this organization employed Mr. John Collier, a student of Indian affairs, as field representative. As legal counsel the services of Francis O. Wilson of Santa Fe were obtained. Two congressional committees heard the case against the Bursum bill. The arguments presented by Mr. Wilson were strong and conclusive, and, together with the testimony of many who opposed the enactment of the proposed law, succeeded in "killing" the bill.

A counter-proposal known as the Jones-Leatherwood bill was suggested by the adversaries of the Bursum act, but this measure also failed to obtain the approval of congress. Pressed by constituents from New Mexico, Senator Bursum introduced a new measure on December 10, 1923, which called for the appointment of a commission to investigate Pueblo land titles. Congress failed to pass the measure during the 1923 session. In 1924, however, the act was revived and approved by congress on June 7. Known as the Pueblo Lands Act, this measure provided the means by which a final solution was made of the thousands of non-Indian claims within the lands of the Pueblo Indians.

C. THE PUEBLO LANDS ACT

The Pueblo Lands Act established a "Pueblo Lands Board" consisting of the Secretary of the Interior, the Attorney General, and a third member appointed by the President. This board was, by section 2 of the act, given the duty of determining "the exterior boundaries of any land granted or confirmed to the Pueblo Indians of New Mexico by any authority of the United States of America, or any prior sovereignty, or acquired by said Indians as a community by purchase or otherwise," and to determine the status of all lands within such boundaries, subject to the requirement that a finding that Indian title had been extinguished required a unanimous vote of the board.

The Attorney General was directed, in section 8 of the Pueblo Lands Act, to bring suit to quiet title to all lands listed as pueblo lands by the Lands Board.

Section 4 of the act provided that non-Indian claimants, in order to substantiate their claims, must demonstrate either (a) continuous adverse possession under color of title since January 8, 1906, supported by payment of taxes on the land, or (b) continuous adverse possession since March 16, 1858, supported by payment of taxes, but without color of title.

With respect to all lands and water rights found to have been lost by the Pueblos which might have been recovered by reasonable prosecution on the part of the United States, the United States was to reimburse the Pueblos the fair market value of the lands and water rights (Sec. 8). On the other hand, the board was to report back to Congress the value of all improvements lost by non-Indian claimants whose claims were rejected (Sec. 7, 15).

Other provisions of the Pueblo Lands Act provided for the filing of suit by the United States "in its sovereign capacity as guardian of said Pueblo Indians" in the nature of a bill of discovery (sec. 1); the investigation of lands and improvements of successful non-Indian claimants which might be purchased for the benefit of the Pueblos (sec. 8), the patenting of lands to successful non-Indian claimants (sec. 13), the adjudication of non-Indian claims superior to the original Pueblo grants and the filing of recommendations by the Secretary of the Interior respecting such adjudications (sec. 14), and various other matters of procedure (secs 6, 9, 10, 11, 12, 18, 19).

Where lands for which the pueblo title was confirmed were inconveniently located, the Secretary of the Interior "with the consent of the governing authorities of the pueblo" might order them to be sold and the proceeds, after deducting the value of improvements of a losing claimant, were to be "paid over to the proper officer, or officers, of the Indian community" (Sec. 16).

Section 17 of the Pueblo Lands Act is a measure of substantive law directed to the prevention of future disputes rather than to the settlement of past disputes.

Inasmuch as past disputes had arisen generally out of controversies concerning the validity of purported transfers of land or interests in land by pueblo authorities or individual Pueblo Indians, this section laid down an absolute rule that no such transfer should be of any validity in the future, unless approved in advance by the Secretary of the Interior. Thus the final step was taken in assimilating pueblo lands to the status of other tribal lands. The section in question declares:

No right, title, or interest in or to the lands of the Pueblo Indians of New Mexico to which their title has not been extinguished as heretofore determined shall hereafter be acquired or initiated by virtue of the laws of the State of New Mexico, or in any other manner except as may hereafter be provided by Congress, and no sale, grant, lease of any character, or other conveyance of lands, or any title or claim thereto, made by any pueblo as a community, or any Pueblo Indian living in a community of Pueblo Indians, in the State of New Mexico, shall be of any validity in law or in equity unless the same be first approved by the Secretary of the Interior."

The constitutionality of the Pueblo Lands Act was upheld in a series of cases in the federal courts in which its provisions were applied.¹ The end results of the Pueblo Lands Act are thus described in the study of Herbert O. Brayer:²

Following the final adjudication of the pueblo titles, the special attorney for the Pueblo Indians was faced with the tremendous task of ejecting those claimants whose titles had been declared invalid. This official and the superintendent of the United States agency withheld any action in this regard until the awards made by the Pueblo lands board had been provided for by the Congress of the United States and paid to the holders of the rejected claims. Following this settlement the special attorney began the tedious process of clearing the Indian lands of all persons having no right to be upon them. At this writing, August 10, 1938, the special attorney for the Pueblo Indians, Mr. William Bishop of Albuquerque, states that all such non-Indian claimants have been removed. For the first time, therefore, since late in the seventeenth century, the Pueblo Indians of New Mexico are free from land controversy.

Under a special acquisition program the Indian service is proceeding rapidly to purchase such lands as were confined to non-Indians by the Pueblo lands board and the courts, and which were deemed desirable for the needs of the Indians. With the conclusion of this program the Pueblo Indians will have no grounds for further disputes over lands granted them by the Spanish authorities and confirmed by the United States.

The Pueblo Lands Act was implemented by a series of enactments outlining into effect the purposes of that act. Sums of money were appropriated for the expenses of the board¹ and for payments to the Pueblos and to non-Indian claimants, in the cases covered by the Pueblo Lands Act and in other cases which Congress deemed worthy of special consideration because of inadequacy of awards or special hardships.²

The Pueblo Lands Act was further implemented and amended by the Act of May 31, 1893,³ a comprehensive measure directed primarily to the execution of awards under the original act. Section 1 of the Act of May 31, 1893, provides that appropriations for awards to the Pueblos

* * * shall be expended by the Secretary of the Interior, subject to approval of the governing authorities of each pueblo in question, at such times and in such amounts as he may deem wise and proper; for the purchase of lands and water rights to replace those which have been divested from said pueblos under the Act of June 7, 1924, or for the purchase or construction of reservoirs, irrigation works, or other permanent improvements upon or for the benefit of the lands of said pueblos.

Section 2 of the act authorizes awards in addition to those made by the Pueblo Lands Board to the following Pueblos: Jemez, Nambe, Taos, Santa Ana, Santo Domingo, Sandia, San Felipe, Isleta, Picuris, San Ildefonso, San Juan, Santa Clara, Cochiti, and Pajarito. The Secretary of the Interior is directed to report back to Congress errors or omissions in the authorizations contained in this section "measured by the present fair market value of the lands involved" (p. 108-109).

Section 3 of the act authorizes money awards to white settlers and non-Indian claimants whose claims have been rejected by (the Pueblo Lands Board (p. 108). Again the Secretary of the Interior is directed to report back to Congress errors in the amount specified measured by the present fair market value of the lands involved (p. 109).

Section 4 of the act directs the Secretary of Agriculture to issue a permit to the Pueblo of Taos "upon application of the governor and council thereof," such permit to grant to the Pueblo the right to use certain designated lands "upon which lands said Indians depend for water supply, forage for their domestic livestock, wood and timber for their personal use and as the scene of certain of their religious ceremonies" (p. 109).

Section 5 of this act regulates the manner in which the Secretary of the Interior may dispose of funds awarded to the Pueblo in purchasing lands, water rights, options, etc. (p. 110). This section contains the following provisions establishing the policy of pueblo control, subject to departmental consent, in the utilization of pueblo funds:

That the Secretary of the Interior shall not make any expenditures out of the pueblo funds resulting from the appropriations set forth herein, or prior appropriations for the same purpose, without first obtaining the approval of the governing authorities of the pueblo affected. And provided further, That the governing authorities of any pueblo may institute matters pertaining to the purchase of lands in behalf of their respective pueblos, which matters, or contracts relative thereto, will not be binding or considered until approved by the Secretary of the Interior. (P. 110.)

Section 6 of this act safeguards the right of the Pueblos to prosecute independent suits for the recovery of lands claimed by third parties. This section also provides that the Pueblos may enter into agreement with the Secretary of the Interior to abandon such suit and to accept instead awards provided by this act.

Section 7 of the act amends section 16 of the Act of June 7, 1924, the original Pueblo Lands Act, providing that the Secretary of the Interior may, "with the consent of the governing authorities of the pueblo," order the sale of land to the highest bidder whose such land although awarded to the Pueblo is not wanted (p. 111).

Section 8 of the act regulates the fees of attorneys employed by the Pueblos (p. 111).

Section 9 safeguards existing water rights (p. 111).

Section 10 provides that the awards authorized to be appropriated under section 2 of this act to the Pueblos shall be appropriated in three annual installments beginning with the fiscal year 1937 (p. 111).

D. THE DEVELOPMENT OF FEDERAL CONTROL

The development of plenary federal control over the Pueblos of New Mexico, inaugurated in the Shoshone Act, confirmed in the Sandoval case, and carried into effect by the Pueblo Lands Act and supplementary statutes, characterizes congressional legislation, judicial decisions, and administrative policies in the period from 1910 to the present. This period in the legal history of the Pueblos is characterized by several legislative developments which parallel the solution of pueblo land problems.

(1) A marked increase in the federal services provided for the New Mexico Pueblos by the Bureau of Indian Affairs, under authority of the regular appropriation acts.

(2) As a corollary of this extension of federal services, the imposition of various debts and liens against the Pueblos.

(3) A prohibition against the alienation of pueblo lands.

(4) A number of lesser statutes further defining the status of the Pueblo Indians.

⁴ 47 Stat. March 27, 1928, c. 235, 45 Stat. 372, protecting the watershed of Taos Pueblo within the Carson National Forest.

A brief commentary on these developments in the law governing the Pueblos is in order.

(1) The increase of federal services administered for the benefit of the Pueblos through the Department of the Interior is evident upon a reading of the appropriation acts for the Bureau of Indian Affairs and, beginning with the Act of May 24, 1925,⁴² for the Department of the Interior. The most important of the federal appropriations for the Pueblos, since 1910, are for irrigation,⁴³ drainage of pueblo lands,⁴⁴ increased educational facilities for the Pueblo Indians,⁴⁵ construction of bridges and roads,⁴⁶ and the establishment of a sanatorium for the Pueblo Indians.⁴⁷

A number of difficult questions have arisen in connection with the reclamation of pueblo lands through the Middle Rio Grande Conservancy District. This is a political subdivision of the State of New Mexico. Within the area of its operations lie the lands of several Pueblos. The Act of February 14, 1927,⁴⁸ authorized an appropriation of federal funds for reconnaissance work on the lands of Cochiti, Santa Domingo, San Felipe, Santa Ana, Sardinia, and Isleta Pueblos. Upon the completion of the survey thus authorized,⁴⁹ there was enacted the Act of March 13, 1928,⁵⁰ which authorized the Secretary of the Interior to enter into a contract with the Middle Rio Grande Conservancy District for conservation, irrigation, drainage, and flood-control work covering pueblo lands. The statute fixed a maximum construction cost of $1,503,311, payable in not less than five annual installments. Such payments were to be made by the United States, subject to reimbursement "under such rules and regulations as may be prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior." To ensure such payments, the statute imposed a lien upon newly reclaimed pueblo lands and declared that reimbursement should be made out of rentals of newly reclaimed lands, or, if such lands were ever sold, out of the proceeds of the sale. No lien for construction costs was imposed on those lands already irrigated by the Pueblo Indians, and it was provided that "such irrigated area of approximately 8,848 acres shall not be subject by the district or otherwise to any pro rata share of the cost of future operation and maintenance or betterment work performed by the district." Further protection of Indian rights is contained in provisions assuring the priority of Indian water rights, preference to Indian lessees in the leasing of newly reclaimed lands, and free leasing of 4,000 acres of such lands to Indians cultivating the same.

Under the foregoing statute a contract was executed between the Secretary of the Interior and the Middle Rio Grande Conservancy District on December 14, 1928.

As construed by the Solicitor of the Interior Department, the statute and the contract permitted the district to charge operation and maintenance costs on pueblo lands outside of the 8,848 acres already irrigated but did not authorize the payment of such charges either by the United States or by the Pueblos.⁵¹ This omission was remedied by the Act of August 27, 1935,⁵² which authorized the Secretary of the Interior to contract for the payment of operation and maintenance costs on the newly reclaimed lands for 5 years "on a reimbursable basis."

Appropriations have been made from time to time by Congress to meet the obligations to the Middle Rio Grande Conservancy District assumed under the 1928 and 1935 acts.⁵³

(2) A number of the appropriations above discussed are, by the express language of the appropriation acts, reimbursable in accordance with rules and regulations which the Secretary of the Interior shall prescribe.⁵⁴

(3) While section 17 of the Pueblo Lands Act, as we have noted, bars transfers of pueblo land not approved in advance by the Secretary of the Interior, section 4 of the Act of June 18, 1934,⁵⁵ goes further and bars all transfers of tribal land except such as are made in exchange for lands of equal value.⁵⁶

The Act of June 18, 1934, applies to all the Pueblos of New Mexico except the Pueblo of Jemez, as a result of referendum elections held in each Pueblo pursuant to section 18 of the act. The present situation, therefore, is that the Pueblo of Jemez, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, may alienate pueblo lands or interests therein, but that the other Pueblos can alienate lands or interests in land only where two conditions are met: Land of equal value must be received in exchange; and the approval of the Secretary of the Interior must be obtained in advance.

(4) The admission of New Mexico to statehood was promptly followed by a series of legislative measures designed to prevent the further expulsion of Indian lands within the state. The Appropriation Act of June 30, 1918,⁵⁷ attached the following proviso to the regular appropriation for the survey and allotment of lands in severalty:

Provided, That no part of said sum shall be used for survey, resurvey, classification, appraisement, or allotment of any land in severalty upon the public domain to any Indian, whether of the Navajo or other tribes, within the State of New Mexico and the State of Arizona. (P. 78.)

⁵⁷ 45 Stat. 512. For regulations adopted pursuant to this law, see 25 C. F. R. 128.1.

This proviso is repeated in every regular Indian Bureau and Interior Department appropriation act up to and including the appropriation act of February 17, 1933.¹⁰

In the Appropriation Act of May 25, 1918,¹¹ the following item of permanent substantive law appears:

That hereafter no Indian reservation shall be created, nor shall any additions be made to one heretofore created, within the limits of the States of New Mexico and Arizona, except by Act of Congress. (P. 570)

"The Appropriation Act of June 22, 1930,"¹² continued a third limitation on the expansion of Indian lands in New Mexico, in the form of a proviso attached to the appropriation for land purchases pursuant to section 6 of the Act of June 18, 1931. This proviso, which has been substantially reappeared in each succeeding appropriation act,¹³ declared:

Provided, That within the States of Arizona, New Mexico, and Wyoming no part of said sum shall be used for the acquisition of land outside of the boundaries of existing Indian reservations. (P. 1705)

While these legislative barriers were being erected against acquisition of non-Indian lands for Indian use, the acquisition of Indian lands for non-Indian use was facilitated by the Act of May 10, 1920,¹⁴ entitled "An Act To provide for the condemnation of the lands of Pueblo Indians in New Mexico for public purposes, and making the laws of the State of New Mexico applicable to such proceedings." Under this act pueblo lands "may be condemned for any public purpose and for any purpose for which lands may be condemned under the laws of the State of New Mexico." Condemnation proceedings under this act must be brought in the federal courts, and notice of suit must be served upon the superintendent or other officer in charge of the particular public use the land is situated.¹⁵

This act is substantially similar to the general statute governing condemnation of allotted lands, but there is no parallel statute governing tribal lands generally, so that the Pueblos are subjected to a type of action from which other tribes are immune.

By the Act of April 21, 1928,¹⁶ general laws governing the acquisition of rights-of-way through Indian lands¹⁷ were made applicable to the Pueblos of New Mexico.

The extension of Indian liquor laws to the Pueblos, effected by the Reaching Act of 1910,¹⁸ called forth a special reference to the Pueblos in a provision of the Appropriation Act of August 24, 1911,¹⁹ exempting substantial wine from such laws.²⁰

A further piece of special legislation for the Pueblo Indians is found in the Appropriation Act of March 2, 1917,²¹ which contains a proviso to the effect that no part of the sum appropriated for pay of judges of Indian courts "shall be used to pay any judge for the Pueblo Indians of New Mexico, and that no such judge shall be appointed for such Indians by any United States official or employee."

This account of legislation peculiarly affecting the Pueblo Indians during the period of Statehood, would not be complete without a reference to the course of legislation affecting the expenditure of tribal funds. At first, the funds awarded to the Pueblos under the Pueblo Lands Act were expendable by the Secretary of the Interior for the purchase of land and water rights for such Indians.²² The purposes for which such funds might be expended were broadened in subsequent appropriation acts to cover fencing, irrigation, improvement, and the repayment of federal loans to Pueblos for "industry and self-support,"²³ and purchase of agricultural machinery.²⁴ Until the Act of May 31, 1933, however, discretion in the expenditure of pueblo funds was vested in the Secretary of the Interior. The act of that date made the consent of the governing authorities of the Pueblo concerned a condition precedent in the expenditure of pueblo funds. The principle thus established was generalized a year later in section 30 of the Act of June 18, 1931.²⁵

For almost decades the Pueblos have faced the choice of being treated like other Indian tribes and subjected to federal control of their internal affairs or being treated like non-Indians and finding themselves cut loose from federal services and then handicapped by lack of federal protection. Recent legislation and administration have overcome this dilemma by recognizing the right of self-government to be an inherent right of the Pueblos and, at other times, and by lessening the scope of federal supervision in the field of Indian affairs so that the Pueblos, like other tribes, may enjoy federal services and federal protection without surrendering control over their internal municipal life.

SECTION 5. PUEBLO SELF-GOVERNMENT¹⁶¹

At least since the Shoshone decision, in 1918, there has been no room for doubt that the Pueblos of New Mexico are Indian.

¹⁶¹ Although in matters of self-government each pueblo is autonomous, mention should be made of the all-Pueblo Council, which has functioned as a consultative body to matters of common concern to the New Mexico Pueblos since 1922. On the operation of this body, see American Indian Life, Bulletin No. 10 (October-November 1927), pp. 7-18.

tribes entitled to the same rights of self-government, under the Constitution and laws of the United States, as other Indian tribes. The scope of these rights of self-government has been outlined in Chapter 7 of this volume and need not be discussed further at this point. The actual exercise of these rights, however, by the Pueblos has given rise to at least three legal problems which deserve special mention, namely: (1) The legal authority of pueblo officers, (2) the status of religious liberties of pueblo members, in view of the intimate connection between religious and political affairs in the pueblo system of government, and (3) the right of the Pueblo to control occupancy rights of individual members in pueblo lands.

(1) The question of the authority of pueblo officers has generally arisen in connection with the validity of agreements purportedly executed on behalf of a Pueblo. The case of Pueblo of Santa Rosa v. Hall,¹⁰¹ turned on the issue of whether the "captain" of an alleged Pueblo in the State of Arizona had authority to act for the Pueblo in executing a contract affecting tribal claims to land. The Supreme Court held that according to the custom of the Pueblo the "captain" would have no authority to act on behalf of the Pueblo in a matter of this importance, declaring:

That Luis was without power to execute the papers in question for lack of authority from the Indian council, in our opinion is well established. (17, 310-310.)

The suit based upon the alleged agreement with the pueblo "captain" was ordered dismissed "without prejudice to the bringing of any other suit heretofore by and with the authority of the alleged Pueblo of Santa Rosa" (17, 321).

The rule announced in the case of the Pueblo of Santa Rosa has been applied to the Pueblos of New Mexico. The Solicitor of the Department of the Interior held, in a memorandum of March 11, 1935, that a grant of a right-of-way executed by the Governor of Indian-owned Pueblo was invalid for the reason that "According to the custom of the pueblo, a grant of lands cannot be made by the governor, but only by the governor and council, or by an assembly of the entire pueblo."

In matters of lesser importance than the disposition of pueblo lands and claims, pueblo authority will generally be exercised by the civil officers or the civil council of the Pueblo. Among the Rio Grande Pueblos, the roster of officers generally includes a governor, the chief executive of the Pueblo, a lieutenant governor, and one or more war captains (who in addition to their religious duties generally act as police officers), hacendos (who are charged with care of graveyards and church property), and sheriffs (messengers of the Governor and council), all elected for 1-year terms. The civil council will generally include the officers and a number of "principales." The status of "principales" is a more or less permanent status generally conferred upon those who have held the post of governor and sometimes upon those who have held other elective offices in the Pueblo.

Within this general framework of pueblo government there are, of course, many variations of structure and except in the Pueblos of Laguna and Santa Clara, which operate under written constitutions,¹⁰² questions of governmental structure and authority would require specific inquiry into the custom of the particular Pueblo.

(2) Questions involving religious aspects of pueblo social life are fraught with such difficulty and complexity that it would be rash to attempt to formulate the law governing this field of pueblo life except in terms of very specific fact situations. It may be worth while, however, to note several covenants against hasty and tempting conclusions in this field.

In the first place, it must be recognized that while the Spaniards insisted upon a separation of religious and lay authority within each Pueblo, and the regular civil officers and civil council were set up in response to this insistence, this separation has probably nowhere been completely carried through, except in the Pueblo of Laguna. Thus one may find that nominations to civil office are made by the cargueros, the native religious leaders of the Pueblo, and in some Pueblos, always elected unanimously thereto by the pueblo assembly.

In the second place, it should be noted that the distinction between religious and civil services required of pueblo members is a distinction on which two experts will seldom agree.

Finally, it should be remembered that the doctrine of separation of church and state, although fundamental in the government of the United States, has never been imposed by Congress as a formula to which the Pueblos must adhere.

In view of these difficulties, efforts to apply to the Pueblos customs of religious liberty which would apply to federal or state governments must be viewed with extreme reserve.

The memorandum submitted to Assistant Attorney General Blair by Special Assistant to the Attorney General G. A. Iverson, on October 2, 1935, dealing with suppression of the use of piyote in the Pueblo of Taos, illustrates the difficulties of the subject and provides a useful guide for further inquiries of this nature. In this case certain Indians were guilty in violation of a tribal custom or ordinance had been fined by the pueblo council and punished by having their land assignments taken away from them. The Iverson memorandum deals with the question of whether the Federal Government might intervene to correct an apparent injustice done to the people users of the Pueblo.

The memorandum reaches the conclusion that the Pueblo Indians are entitled to the protection of the First Amendment guaranteeing religious liberty, but that this amendment is inapplicable to the action of the Pueblo authorities themselves as distinguished from the action of federal authorities,¹⁰³ that the authority of the tribal court of the Pueblo was clear, that the executive officers of the United States would have no authority to interfere with the administration of justice by the pueblo court in matters affecting relations between members of the Pueblo,¹⁰⁴ that the revocation of an assignment by the Pueblo council, which had been imposed as a penalty, was in violation of the Act of June 7, 1924,¹⁰⁵ so that the Secretary of the Interior would be justified in taking the position "that the attempted execution is invalid and without force and effect,"¹⁰⁶ and finally, that the Federal Government would not be aided by any judicial proceeding to interfere with the action of the tribal council in these cases.¹⁰⁷

The Iverson opinion apparently assumed that the occupancy interest of the Indians concerned was an interest in land within the meaning of the Act of June 7, 1924, which governs the transfer of interests in land of the Pueblo Indians. "The factual correctness of this assumption with respect to the land of the Pueblo Indians of Taos is perhaps open to question."¹⁰⁸ This does not affect the validity of the argument presented in the Iverson memorandum that the officials of a Pueblo would not be authorized to transfer interests in land from one individual to another. If, however, no such action is attempted, that is to say, if what the individual pueblo member has is not an interest in land but a privilege of use terminable at the will of the Pueblo itself, it would appear that the limitation referred to in the Iverson memorandum is of no practical importance in the situation dealt with. If in point of fact the individual member has only a privilege of occupancy terminable at the will of the Pueblo, then the Pueblo would clearly be justified in terminating that occupancy without the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

The Iveson opinion contains an illuminating analysis of the judicial authority of the Pueblo council:

The Indian officials who assumed to dispose of the emphyteusis in the instant case obtained their authority, whatever it was, from the Indian law under this governmental policy of self-development or self-determination. They constituted a determining body as a part of a local government which in its principal aspects contained the elements of representative government as that term is understood in our system. It appears to have been created upon deliberate action on the part of the tribe, and while its exercise of authority was necessarily limited by various and sundry acts of Congress, it rested upon what appears to have been a custom of long duration. Time it is not a court with such dignity as that for example of the Seneca Indians of New York who had adopted a constitutional charter relating to various domestic subjects connected with domestic relations and even property rights (Rice v. Hughes, 2 Fed. Supp. 167), but patently the absence of formality or regularity of procedure is not a requirement going on to affecting the validity or binding force and effect of conclusions reached or judgments announced within the scope of the limited authority of such an institution.

In what has been said above it is assumed that warship by the Indians and the practice of religious ceremonies in internal affairs of the Indians. Accordingly, if the use of people was antithetical as pernicious to the welfare of the Indians and the Indian Community, to regulate its use or prevent it altogether cannot be questioned because forsooth it was used as a part of a religious ceremony. It seems to me that the question in either event presents a tribal matter and mind under the authorities be left to tribal determination. Thus, the present Council may be wrong. It may be actuated by bias or prejudice against the members of the Native American Church. It may be that their actions were influenced by ulterior motives and that a wrong should be corrected, but as before stated, the Indians themselves created the tribunal and custom and usage support the validity of its judgments. Next year another election will probably be held and a different tribunal induced into office. The government of the Indians in this case being in a measure at least representative, they should be left in matters of this character to their own devices. There being no appeal from the judgment of the court, the right of appeal being purely statutory, the judgment cannot be reversed, but this fact does not affect either the jurisdiction or the power.¹¹⁸

(3) The right of the Pueblo to control occupancy rights of individual members in pueblo lands is essentially similar to the right of other tribes with respect to tribal lands, discussed in Chapter 9 of this volume. Although, as noted, the Iveson memorandum held that the council of the Pueblo could not, without the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, revoke or transfer an interest in land possessed by a member of the Pueblo, the assumption that individual Tewa Indians held such interests in land is not supported by any facts set forth in the Iveson memorandum. A recent memorandum of the Solicitor of the Interior Department on this point¹¹⁹ declares, after setting forth the language of section 17 of the Act of June 7, 1902:

Under the foregoing language, it must be held that if an assignment in the Santa Clara Pueblo amounts to a transfer of right, title, or interest in real property, any purported assignment, whether to an Indian or to a non-Indian, made by the pueblo without the prior approval of the Secretary of the Interior is without validity in law or equity. On the other hand, if an assignment does not convey an interest in the land itself, it does not fall within the scope of the statute cited. It becomes important, therefore, to distinguish between those transactions which convey an interest in real property and those transactions which, while relating to the use of real property, do not create an interest therein.

This distinction has been considered by the courts in a great variety of cases which seek to distinguish an interest in land from a mere license. A recent decision in the Circuit Court of Appeals for the Eighth Circuit holds:

"A mere permission to use land, dominion over it remaining in the owner and no interest or exclusive possession of it being given, is but a license. (Citing authorities.) (Trpa v. United States, 70 F. (2d) 325, 326.) (C. C. A. 5, 1934.)"

The essential characteristics of a license to use real property, as distinguished from an interest in real property, is that in the former case the licensee has no vested right as against the licensor or third parties. He has only a privilege, which the licensor may terminate.

As Justice Holmes pointed out, in Marion v. Washington Forken Club, 227 U. S. 134, 135, "A contract binds the person of the maker but does not create an interest in the property that it may concern, unless it also operates as a conveyance. . . . But if it did not create such an interest, that is to say, a right in rem valid against the licensor and third persons, the holder had no right to enforce specific performance or self-help. His only right was to sue upon the contract for the breach." (At p. 133.)

But in its simplest terms, the rule is that a landowner does not transfer an interest in his land by allowing another to use the land. Thus, to give an example, a member of the landowner's family, inasmuch as he is "a bare licensee of the owner, who has no legal interest in the land," cannot derive from his legal privilege to use the land "a right against the landowner or against third persons." Mellott's Trust v. Dixon, 81 N. D. 701 (N. D. 1911). See also Karlson Lumber Co. v. Kahuna, (6 N. W. 307 (Wis. 1900)).

The distinction established by the cases between a license and an interest in land is entirely consistent with the purpose of the Pueblo Land Act of June 7, 1902.

A reading of the legislative history of that act shows that it was designed to stop the loss of pueblo lands by stopping transactions from which a claim against the pueblo might ultimately be derived. Thus if a pueblo, under the guise of making assignments, should in effect grant a life estate or even a leasehold interest to an individual member of the pueblo, there would be in transaction upon which a claim adverse to the pueblo might be founded either by the individual or by a third party to whom he might convey his rights. On the other hand, the action or inaction of the pueblo authorities in permitting a pueblo member to use a designated area of pueblo land would not of itself create any interest in land adverse to the title of the pueblo itself, any more than the decision of a family council to select certain rooms or buildings to certain members of the family would constitute a transfer of an interest in land.

In between these two extremes difficult " twilight zone " cases may appear. In these cases the court has been looked to the intention of the parties to determine whether the transaction was intended to create a right against the landowner and against third parties. If it was so intended, the transaction must be regarded as a conveyance of an interest in real property. If not, a mere license relationship is established.

Even the language of leasing will not suffice to create a lease relationship if the transaction leaves complete power over the land in the hands of the landowner. Thus, in the case of Trpa v. United States, 70 F. (2d) 325 (C. C. A. 5, 1934), the court found that an instrument which used the terms "landlord," "tenant," "lease," etc., was nevertheless a mere license, because the so-called "lessor," the War Department, had no power to lease the property or to grant more than a revocable permit to use the property.

It would be entirely improper for me to attempt to apply the general principles, above set forth, to an imaginary assignment that might be made in the future by an Indian under an imaginary ordinance that has not yet been passed. When an actual assignment is made or proposed and the bylaws, ordinances, unwritten customs or expressed intentions of the parties which bear upon the issues above presented are laid before us, I shall be glad to render an opinion on the question of whether such assignment involves a conveyance of an interest in land and is therefore invalid without prior Secretarial approval.

The foregoing discussion however should make clear the right of the pueblo to grant a lease license for the use of lands to the members of the pueblo. It should be equally clear, under the principles above set forth, that the pueblo lacks power to grant more than a mere license and that any oral transaction or written instrument purporting to grant an interest in land valid against the pueblo itself or against third parties would be void at law and in equity.

SECTION 6. PUEBLO LAND TITLES

Without further reference to the history of pueblo land titles, dealt with in the earlier sections of this chapter, we may attempt a statement of the incidents of pueblo land ownership today. At the present time the land ownership of the Pueblos is of two types. There is, in the first place, land to which the Pueblos hold fee title, under grants of the Spanish, the Mexican, or the United States Governments, or by reason of purchases made by the Pueblo. In the second place, there is land to which legal title is held by the United States, the equitable ownership of which is vested in the Pueblo. Such lands include statutory reservations¹¹⁶ and Executive order reservations of lands formerly part of the public domain.¹¹⁷ Likewise, lands purchased by the United States for the benefit of the Pueblo, whether through the use of pueblo funds or through the use of grants, appropriations, may fall under this category. In its relations to third parties, however, the rights of the Pueblo are not substantially affected by the distinction between the two forms of title.¹¹⁸ As a legal owner or as an equitable owner the Pueblo has all the ordinary rights of a landowner with respect to third parties except the right of alienation. The Pueblo has the right to exclude third parties from its land,¹¹⁹ and it has the right to qualify this exclusion by specific conditions, under which third parties will be permitted to enter upon pueblo lands. As a landowner the Pueblo may insist that its members pay a sum of money for the privilege of entering the pueblo lands, and that while they are within the pueblo boundaries they refrain from certain types of conduct which the pueblo authorities classify as offensive. As a landowner the Pueblo may grant and revocable rights of occupancy, grazing permits, or other licenses to nonmembers, provided that no property interest is thereby identified, and subject to the approval of the Interior Department where such approval is required by existing law. Likewise, the Pueblo may lease pueblo lands to members or to outsiders subject to the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. The necessity of obtaining the consent of the United States to any transaction involving alienation of a property interest, whether by sale, mortgage, exchange gift, or lease is a matter to which we have already given consideration at pages 380 and 385.

The legal authority of the Pueblo to exercise the rights of a landowner does not depend upon the peculiar facts with respect to the legal title of pueblo grant lands. Its rights are congruent with the rights of other tribes, which have been analyzed in Chapter 15 of this volume.

The limitations upon these rights, which generally submit to the limitations placed upon land ownership by other tribes, are made specific by the terms of the Pueblo Lands Act of June 7, 1924, which has been discussed on page 380. Briefly summarized, it may be said that in its relations with the states, the Federal Government, the members of the Pueblo, and third parties generally, the Pueblo is the owner of lands granted or reserved to it, except that it does not have the right to dispose of the land or any interest therein without the approval of the United States.

SECTION 7. THE RELATION OF THE PUEBLOS TO THE FEDERAL GOVERNMENT

That the Pueblos are wards of the United States in the sense in which that phrase was first used, i. e., that Congress possesses plenary power to govern the Pueblos, is a proposition that has not been and is doubt since the Randall case,¹²⁰ There remains the question how far Congress has exercised this power and, in particular, how far Congress has conferred upon the Executive branch of the Federal Government authority over the Pueblos. The question of the scope of Executive power with respect to the Pueblos is dealt with in a recent opinion of the Solicitor of the Interior Department¹²¹ from which the following passage is quoted.

One of the points on which administrative control is clearly established relates to the disposition of real property. Here the cases hold that the Pueblos have no power to dispose of real property except with the consent of the United States. Such consent may be given expressly by the Secretary of the Interior, or implicitly through a legal action involving pueblo lands. In the latter case the United States must be a party to the action, or else the Pueblos must be represented by an attorney appointed by the United States, if the decree against the Pueblos is to have validity.

The chief authority cited for this statement is the case of United States v. Caudillo,¹²² in which the following question was certified to the Supreme Court:

1. Are Pueblo Indians in New Mexico in such status of tutelage as to their lands by that State that the United States, in such guardianship, is not barred either by a judgment in a suit involving title to such lands begun in the territorial court and pending to judgment after statehood or by a judgment in a similar action in the United States District Court for the District of New Mexico, where, in each of said actions, the United States was not a party nor was the attorney representing such Indians therein authorized so to do by the United States? (P. 438.)

This question the Supreme Court answered in the following terms, per Van Devanter, J.:

Many provisions have been enacted by Congress—some general and other special—to prevent the Government's

Indian wards from improvidently disposing of their lands and becoming homeless public charges. One of these provisions, now embodied in section 2131 of the Revised Statutes, declares: "No pueblo, grant, lease, or other conveyance of lands, or of any title or claim thereon from any Indian nation or tribe of Indians, shall be of any validity in law or equity, unless the same be made by treaty or convention entered into pursuant to the Constitution." This provision was originally adopted in 1831, c. 161, sec. 12, 1 Stat. 739, and, with others "regulating trade and intercourse with the Indian tribes," was extended over "the Indian tribes" of New Mexico in 1851, c. 74, sec. 7, 9 Stat. 587.

While there is no express reference in the provision to Pueblo Indians, we think it must be taken as including them. They are plainly within its spirit, and in our opinion, fairly within its words, "any tribe of Indians." Although sedentary, industrious and disposed to peace, they are Indians in race, customs, and domestic government, always have lived in isolated communities, and are a simple, unimproved people, ill-equipped to cope with the intelligence and armed forces of the Government. It is difficult to believe that Congress in 1851 was not intending to protect them, but only the nomadic and savage Indians then living in New Mexico. A more reasonable view is that the term "Indian tribe" was used in the acts of 1831 and 1851 in the sense of a body of Indians of the same or a similar race, united in a community under one leadership or government, and inhabiting a particular though sometimes ill-defined territory." Montoya v. United States, 180 U. S. 237, 240. In that sense the term easily includes Pueblo Indians.

Under the Spanish law Pueblo Indians, although having title to their lands, were regarded as in a state of tutelage and could alienate their lands only under governmental supervision. See Chouteau v. Colonay, 10 How. 263, 237. Text writers have differed about the situation under the Mexican law, but in United States v. Pico, 5 Wall. 693, 640, this Court, speaking through Mr. Justice Field, who was specially informed on the subject, expressly recognized that under the laws of Mexico the government "extended a special guardianship" over Indian pueblos and that a conveyance of pueblo lands to be effective must be "under the supervision and with the approval" of designated authorities. And this was the ruling in Shenoi v. Depphin, 1 Cal. 254, 273, et seq. Thus it appears that Congress in imposing a restriction on the alienation of these lands, as we think it did, was but continuing a policy which prior governments had deemed essential to the protection of such Indians.

With this explanation of the status of the Pueblo Indians and their lands, and of the relation of the United States to both, we come to answer the questions propounded in the certificate.

To the first question we answer that the United States is not barred from reasons why be stated. The Indians of the pueblo lands of the United States and hold their lands subject to the restriction that the same cannot be alienated in any sense without its consent. A judgment of decree which annuls a title or transfers the lands from the Indians, where the United States has not authorized or appeared in the suit, infinges that restriction. The United States has an interest in maintaining and enforcing the restriction which cannot be affected by such a judgment or decree. This Court has said in dealing with a like situation: "It necessarily follows that, as a trustee of the affected lands, contrary to the inhibition of Congress would be a violation of the constitutional rights of the United States arising from its obligation to a dependent people, no stipulations, contracts, or judgments rendered in suits to which the Government is a stranger, can affect its interest." The authority of the United States to enforce the restriction actually created cannot be impaired by any action without its consent." Boyle and Miami Improvement Co. v. United States, 238 U. S. 528, 534. And that ruling has been recognized and given effect in other cases. Pittell v. United States, 285 U. S. 201, 204; Sunderland v. United States, 238 U. S. 230, 232.

But, as it appears that for many years the United States has employed and paid a special attorney to represent the Pueblo Indians and look after their interests, our answer is made with the qualification that, if the decree was rendered in a suit begun and prosecuted by the special attorney so employed and paid, we think the United States is as effectively combined as if it were a party to the suit. Bonfont v. Compagnie des Bateaux, 217 U. S. 475, 480; Leisner v. Murray, 3 Wall. 1, 13; Chute v. Fletcher, 7 Fed. 823; Alstott v. Eaden, 3 Fed. 402, 404; Jancy v. Gimmann Lion Co., 107 Fed. 597, 613 (17 pp. 141 to 144).

The decision reached in the Chouteau case has been followed in a number of cases arising on appeals from decrees of the Pueblo Lands Board.¹¹

The opinion of the Solicitor of the Interior Department quoted above goes on to analyze the scope of Federal executive power over the Pueblos in the following terms:

The power of the Executive extends to the bringing of suits on behalf of a pueblo in matters affecting pueblo lands and controlling the conduct of such litigation. The basis of such power is set forth in the language above quoted from United States v. Chouteau in which Mr. Justice Van Devanter said: "The suit was brought on the theory that these Indians are wards of the United States and that it therefore lies within it and is under a duty to protect them in the ownership and enjoyment of their lands" (271 U. S., at 437). Under section 1 of the Pueblo Lands Act which provides that "the United States of America, in its sovereign capacity as guardian of said Pueblo Indians, shall institute certain actions to quiet title of pueblo lands, a number of suits have been brought on behalf of Indian pueblos."

See for example United States v. Board of National Missions of Presbyterian Church, South, Chouteau v. United States, supra, Pueblo of Pecos v. Abert, supra.

In the last cited case the question was raised whether the pueblo itself was precluded from appealing an adverse decision sustained in an action instituted by the United States on behalf of the pueblo. The court decided:

"It thus appears that at any time prior to the filing of the field notes and plans by the Secretary of the Interior in the office of the Surveyor General of New Mexico (Pueblo Lands Act, sec. 18, 48 Stat. 610 [25 U. S. C. A. sec. 231 note]) either the United States or the pueblo may maintain an action involving the title and right to lands of the pueblo, but a decree rendered in a suit brought by the pueblo does not bind the United States, while a decree rendered in a suit brought by the United States does bind the pueblo."

The statutory power of the United States to institute actions in the Pueblo Indians necessarily involves the power to control such litigation. If the private litigant of the pueblo could dictate the avowals of the bill, or could prevail in questions of judgment in the introduction of evidence, there would be no substance to the guardianship of the United States over the Indians. There cannot be a divided authority in the conduct of litigation; divided authority results in hopeless confusion. If the United States has power in dispute with precedence prior to trial, as has been held, it certainly has power to decline to appeal at all, if it believes the decision of the trial court is without error." (At pp. 13 to 11.)

In view of the foregoing authorities it is clear that the United States is empowered by virtue of its relation to the pueblo and pursuant to special legislation based on that relationship to conduct and control litigation on behalf of the pueblos concerned for the protection of pueblo lands.

No attempt will be made in this opinion to analyze exhaustively the realm in which the Executive arm of the ¹¹ United States v. Board of National Missions of the Presbyterian Church, 27 Fed. 272 (C. C. A. 10, 1920); Gowan v. United States, 48 Fed. 22 878 (C. C. A. 10, 1901); Pueblo of Pecos v. Abert, 50 Fed. 12 (C. C. A. 10, 1891).

Federal Government is empowered to supervise acts of the pueblo government. It is enough for the present to point out on the one hand to the ongoing cases upholding such supervision in matters affecting the disposition of pueblo lands and titillation with reference to such lands and to note, on the other hand, that pueblo rights of self-government in matters internal to the pueblo have been consistently recognized in all the decided cases. In the Constitution of the Santa Clara Pueblo, approved by the Secretary of the Interior on December 20, 1885, an attempt was made to distinguish between matters over which the pueblo has sovereign power, under existing Federal law, and matters over which the Interior Department has final control. This attempt is embodied in the fifth numbered paragraph of Article IV, section 1 of the Pueblo Constitution. This paragraph deals with powers which are not specifically enumerated in section 10 of the act of June 18, 1841, but which are comprehended under the general phrase "all powers vested in any Indian tribe of tribal council by existing law," reads as follows:

"5. To enact ordinances, not inconsistent with the constitution and laws of the pueblo, for the maintenance of law and order within the pueblo and for the punishment of members, and the exclusion of members violating any such ordinances, for the raising of revenue and the appropriation of available lands for pueblo purposes, for the regulation of trade, inheritance, landholding, and private dealings in land within the pueblo, for the guidance of the officers of the pueblo in all their duties, and severally for the punishment of the welfare of the pueblo and for the execution of all other powers vested in the pueblo by existing law. Provided, That any ordinance which affects persons who are not members of the pueblo shall not take effect until it has been approved by the Secretary of the Interior or some officer designated by him."

A third point in the relation of the pueblo to the Federal Government is raised by the question whether the pueblos may resort to legal proceedings against the United States or its officers. While this question is essentially a question of legal procedure, the substantive rights of the pueblos must depend in a very large degree upon the answer given to this question. The question is distinctly and unmistakably answered in the opinion of the Supreme Court said by Mr. Justice Van Devanter, in Lane v. Pueblo of Santa Rosa (240 U. S. 110 (1916)), supra. In that case the pueblo of Santa Rosa was recognized as entitled to bring suit against the Secretary of the Interior to expunge that official from allowing, listing, or disposing of, its own lands of the United States, certain lands claimed by the Indian pueblo.

Again, in the case of Pueblo de San Juan v. United States (147 F. 2d 446 (C. C. A. 10, 1931)), supra, the right of a pueblo to bring suit against the United States, under the Pueblo Lands Act (43 Stat. 187), was upheld.

In accordance with the familiar rule a suit against the United States must be based upon legislation through which the United States permits itself to be sued. Suits against officers of the United States based on alleged official acts require no such statutory authority.

A final question which the relation of the pueblo to the Federal Government has raised is the question whether the pueblos are entitled to the protection of the Federal Constitution with respect to acts done under Federal authority.

The opinion of the Supreme Court in the above-cited case of Lane v. Pueblo of Santa Rosa answers this question in the following terms:

"The defendants assert with much earnestness that the Indians of this pueblo are wards of the United States—recognized as such by the legislative and executive departments—and that in consequence the disposal of their lands is not within their own control, but subject to such regulations as Congress may prescribe for their benefit and protection. Assuming, without as deciding, that this is all true, we think it has no real bearing on the point we are considering. Certainly it would not justify the defendants in treating the lands of these Indians—to which, according to the bill, they have a complete and perfect title—as public lands of the United States and disposing of the same under the public land laws. That would not be an exercise of guardianship, but an act of encroachment. Besides, the Indians are not here seeking to establish any power or equity in themselves to dispose of the lands, but only to prevent a threatened disposal by individuals and officers in disregard of their full ownership. Of their capacity to maintain such a suit we entertain no doubt. The existing wardship is not an obstacle, as is shown by repeated decisions of this court, of which Lozano v. Hitchcock, 187 U. S. 658, is an illustration." (41 pp. 113 to 114.)

Again, it was held in the case of Chavez v. United States, supra, that Congress could not constitutionally deprive a pueblo of the right to plead a New Mexico statute of limitations. The court declared:

"We conclude that such Indian pueblos were entitled to the benefits of the New Mexico statutes of limitation and that the United States, as their guardian, may plead such statutes in their behalf."

"If this be true, then the Pueblo of Taos, having acquired fee simple title to the Townsite tract under section 3501, supra, prior to the adoption of the Pueblo Lands Act, could not be deprived of that title by legislative action." (41 pp. 878.)

In accordance with the foregoing decisions it is plain that while the Indian pueblos have been considered for certain purposes as wards of the Federal Government they are entitled not only to bring suit against that Government and its officers but to receive the same Government and officers the protections guaranteed by the Federal Constitution.

SECTION 8. THE RELATION OF THE PUEBLOS TO THE STATE

We have already noted that the terms upon which New Mexico was admitted to statehood left no room for a claim by the state to governmental power over the Pueblos. The general rule that the Pueblos are not subject to state control must, however, be qualified in several respects.

In the first place, as noted in Chapter 6 of this volume, pueblo lands, like other Indian reservations, are part of the state in which they are situated for purposes of state jurisdiction over non-Indians.

In the second place, Congress has made various state laws, such as laws respecting health and education,¹⁴⁶ applicable on Indian reservations, and these laws are as applicable to the Pueblos as to other Indian tribes.¹⁴⁷

In the third place, the judgments and decrees of the Pueblo Interiors, properly within its jurisdiction would appear to merit the same faith and credit that is owing to other recognized agencies of tribal government under the decisions discussed elsewhere in this volume.¹⁴⁸

A significant problem of the relation of the Pueblos to the State of New Mexico is raised by the possibility of suit by a Pueblo in a state court.¹⁴⁹ On this question an opinion of the Solicitor of the Interior Department¹⁵⁰ declares:

"It has occasionally been assumed that where a State has no jurisdiction over the land of an Indian pueblo, the ¹⁴⁶ See Chapter 14, sec. 3.

M. 220 (1887), dispute over possession of document of title; Pueblo of Jalesa v. Pueblo and Person, 18 N. M. 388, 137 Pac. 80, 10 (1918), condemnation of rights-of-way.

pueblo has no standing in the courts of the State. This assumption is entirely erroneous. Despite the lack of State jurisdiction over pueblo lands, the pueblo may, nevertheless, bring suit in State courts, so far as State law permits and demand, in other respects, recognition as a public corporation. The judgments and ordinances of a pueblo are entitled to the same sort of recognition that State courts give to the acts of another State or nation. The pueblo as a sovereign body is not subject to suit in State courts, except with its own consent. The pueblo is not in that reason a pariah. It is entitled at the very least to all the rights which a foreign nation assert in the courts of a State.

The foregoing views are based upon the judgment of the Supreme Court in United States v. Candelaria.¹² In this case the United States, as guardian of the Pueblo of Laguna, brought a suit to quiet title. The objection was made that prior decisions in the state courts barred the action. The Court commented on the validity of the earlier decrees, in the following terms:

In their assent the defendants denied the wardship of the United States and also set up in bar two decrees rendered in prior suits brought against them by the pueblo to quiet the title to the same lands. One suit was described as begun in 1910 in the territorial court and transferred when New Mexico became a State to the succeeding state court, where on appeal a decree was given in the defendants' favor. . . . In the replication the United States alleged that it was not a party to either of the prior suits, that it neither authorized the bringing of them nor was represented by the attorney who appeared for the pueblo, and therefore that it was not bound by the decrees.

On the case thus presented the court held that the decrees operated to bar the prosecution of the present suit by the United States, and on that ground the bill was dismissed. An appeal was taken to the Circuit Court of Appeals, which after outlining the case as just stated, has certified to this Court the following questions:

2. Did the state court of New Mexico have jurisdiction to enter a judgment which would be res judicata as to the United States, in an action between Pueblo Indians and opposed plaintiffs concerning title to land, where the result of that judgment would be to disavow a survey made in the United States of a Spanish or Mexican grant pursuant to an act of Congress confirming such grant to said Pueblo Indians? (Pr. 198 to 430.)

Coming to this second question, we eliminate so much of it as refers to a possible disregard of a survey made in the United States, for that would have no bearing on the court's jurisdiction on the binding effect of the judgment or decree, but would present only a question of whether error was committed in the course of exercising jurisdiction. With that eliminated, our answer to the question is that the state court had jurisdiction to enter into the suit and proceed to judgment on decree. (P. 414.)

The case of Trinidad v. Prince,¹³ establishing the proposition that an Indian, outside of his Pueblo, is within the scope of the state wrongful death statute, so that his administration may be entitled to recover damages in a state court against a non-Indian, demonstrates that where state law does not interfere with congressional or tribal power it may be invoked in certain cases between Indians and non-Indians. This case does not involve any peculiarities of pueblo law, and the general issues which it raises are dealt with elsewhere in this volume.¹⁴

SECTION 9. THE PUEBLO AS A CORPORATE ENTITY

We have already noted that the Pueblos of New Mexico were given the status of corporations by one of the first acts of the New Mexican Territorial Government.¹⁵ This legislative characterization may be viewed as a transition into Anglo-Saxon terms of the corporate recognition which the Pueblos had long enjoyed under Spanish and Mexican law. In the case of Lane v. Pueblo of Santa Rosa,¹⁶ the Supreme Court declared, per Van Devanter, J.

During the Spanish, as also the Mexican, dominion it enjoyed a large measure of local self-government and was recognized as having capacity to acquire and hold lands and other property. With much reason this might be regarded as enabling and entitling it to become a suzerain, for the purpose of enforcing or defending its property interests. . . . See School District v. Wood, 13 Massachusetts, 388, 118, 1 Conder's Const. Law, 7th ed., p. 276. 1 Diction. Munic. Corp., 5th ed., secs. 50, 61, 65. But our decision need not be put on that ground, for there is another which arises out of our own laws and is in itself sufficient. After the Guadalupe Treaty Congress made that region part of the Territory of New Mexico and subjected it to "all the laws" of that Territory. Act August 4, 1848, c. 245, 10 Stat. 675. One of those laws provided that the inhabitants of any Indian pueblo having a grant in concession of lands from Spain or Mexico, such as is here claimed, should be a body corporate and as such capable of suing or defending in respect of such lands. Laws New Mex. 1861-2, pp. 176 and 418. If the plaintiff was not a legal entity and person under previous laws, it became such under that law; and it retained that status after Congress, included it in the Territory of Arizona, for the act by which this was done extended to that Territory all legislative enactments of the Territory of New Mexico. Act February 21, 1883, c. 50, 12 Stat. 681. The fact that Arizona has since become a State does not affect the plaintiff's corporate status or its power to sue. See Quinn v. Pueblo R. R. Co. v. Johnson, Topka & Santa Fe R. R. Co., 112 U. S. 434 (1912).

The corporate status of the Pueblos has been recognized in many cases.¹⁷

In United States v. Candelaria, the Supreme Court, per Van Devanter, J., commented on the Lane case in these terms:

It was settled in Lane v. Pueblo of Santa Rosa, 240 U. S. 110, that under its various laws enacted with congressional sanction each pueblo in New Mexico—meaning the Indians comprising the communities—was a body corporate and enabled to sue and defend in respect of its lands. . . . That was a suit brought by the Pueblo of Santa Rosa to enjoin the Secretary of the Interior and the Commissioner of the General Land Office from carrying out what was alleged to be an unauthorized purpose and attempt to dispose of the Pueblo's Lands as public land of the United States. Arizona was named from unit of New Mexico and when in that way the pueblo came to be in the new territory it retained its juristic status. (Pp. 442-443.)

The incidents of corporate status¹⁸ attaching to the Pueblos are analyzed in a recent opinion of the Substantive of the Interior Department¹⁹ in the following passage:

It is clear that the decided cases leave no room for doubt on the proposition that the pueblos of New Mexico are corporations, with power to bring suits against third parties, and liability to suits brought by third parties."

It is not so clear what manner of corporation the pueblos are. The most explicit characterization found in any of the Federal cases, heretofore decided is found in the case of United States v. United States, supra, where the Pueblo of Taos is classified under the category of "municipal or public corporations."

" * * By the Act of December, 1847, Rev. St. N. M. 1875, p. 429, section 68-101, N. M. Stat. Ann. Comp. 1923, the Indian Pueblos were given the status of bodies public and corporate and, as such, empowered to sue in respect of their lands. Lake v. Pueblo of Santa Rosa, 240 U. S. 110, 30 S. Ct. 185, 63 L. Ed. 504. A statute of limitation, in the absence of provision therein to the contrary, runs not only for, but against municipal or public corporations. Metropolitan R. Co. v. Dist. of Columbia, 132 U. S. 3, 11-32, 1209 as amended by the Act of June 28, 1916 40 Stat. 1076) is affirmed in two of the opinions of the Solicitor of the Interior Department which contain an exhaustive analysis of Pueblo corporate status. Op. Sol. I. D. M. 2839, February 15, 1907; Op. Sol. I. D., M. 2707, May 14, 1908. On the general problem of the corporate status of Indian tribes, see Chapter 14, see 4.

¹⁴ Op. Sol. I. D. M. 29098, August 6, 1909.

¹⁵ Insofar as the quoted statement indicates that a Pueblo has legal capacity to defend an action, the statement is amply supported by the language of the Supreme Court in the Lane and Oandolea cases, above quoted, and by certain decisions of the Territorial court. (See fn. 127 supra.) The inference, however, at a Pueblo may be sued without its consent would find no support in these opinions of the Supreme Court, and would run contrary to the rule that a sovereign body is immune from suits to which it has not consented. The application of this rule in Five Civilized Tribes cases has been upheld. Turner v. United States, 249 U. S. 354 (1919), Idem v. Idem, 106 Fed. 304 (C. C. A. 8, 1902), Idem v. Choctaw Tribe of Indians, 66 Fed. 372 (C. C. A. 8, 1902), and see United States v. United States Fidelity Co., 108 F. 2d 804, 800 (C. C. A. 10, 1939). That a similar holding would be reached in the case of the New Mexican Pueblos is indicated by United States v. Bandol, 221 U. S. 28, 48 (1913).

108 Ct. 10, 33 L. Ed. 231, Lafitte v. Bennett, 131 Ind. 45 Indho 485, 203 U. S. 40, 58 A. L. R. 822; Rowdell v. D. No. 5 v. Forney County, 52 N. D. 43, 216 N. W. 232, 215. We conclude that such Indian Pueblos were entitled to the benefits of the New Mexico statutes of limitation and that the United States, as their guardian, may plead such statutes in their behalf." (P. 878.)

While the Pueblos of New Mexico fall within certain definitions of "municipal corporations,"¹⁶ it is not intended to suggest that they are municipal corporations of the State of New Mexico within the meaning of state statutes on the rights and powers of such corporations. Such an inference would run counter to the basic doctrines of tribal self-government and congressional sovereignty in Indian affairs. The term "public corporation" is therefore perhaps more appropriate as a characterization of the legal status of the Pueblos. The content of any term of characterization, however, must depend largely upon judicial decisions which have not yet been rendered.

¹⁶ "A municipal corporation, in its strict and proper sense, is the body politic and corporate constituted by the incorporation of the inhabitants of a city or town for the purposes of local government thereof. * * * It may, therefore, define a municipal corporation in its historical and strict sense to be the incorporation, by the authority of the government, of the inhabitants of a particular place or district, and authorizing them in their corporate capacity to exercise subordinate special powers of legislation and regulation with respect to their local and internal concerns. This power of local government in the distinct purpose and the distinguishing feature of a municipal corporation proper." 1 Dillon on Municipal Corporations (6th ed. 1911) sec. 31-32. The essential feature of local self-government has been discussed under an earlier heading. The fact that the Pueblo is a membership corporation rather than a stock corporation is (as obvious to call for discussion) the relation of the corporation to a particular area of land and the inhabitants thereof is made clear in the territorial statute establishing the corporate status of the Pueblo which has been quoted above.

SECTION 1. CLASSIFICATION OF ALASKAN NATIVES

The term "Natives of Alaska" has been defined to include members of the aboriginal races inhabiting Alaska at the time of its annexation to the United States, and their descendants of the whole or mixed blood.¹ Important native groups comprise the Eskimos, which are distinct from, although related to, the American Indians, the Kurok and Aleuts, and the Indians. Among the Indian groups are the Athapascans, Tlingits, Indians, and Tsimshians, which include the Metlakshilans.² According to many reputable anthropologists, all these strains migrated to the New World by way of Bering Strait.

The Eskimos (including the Aleuts) constitute almost two-thirds of the natives.³ They inhabit the shores of the Arctic

³ See 15 of the Russian Act of September 1, 1907, 10 Stat. 900, 902, defines the term "natives of Alaska" as meaning—

"the native Indians, Eskimos, and Aleuts of whole or part blood inhabiting Alaska at the time of the Treaty of Cession of Alaska to the United States, and their descendants of whole or part blood together with the Indians and Eskimos who, since the year 1907 and prior to the enactment hereof, have migrated into Alaska from the Dominion of Canada, and their descendants of the whole or part blood."

By 19 of the Act of June 18, 1951, 48 Stat. 984, 988, provided: "For the purposes of this Act, Eskimos and other aboriginal peoples of Alaska shall be considered Indians."

C. 80, section 112 of the Penal Code of Alaska, Act of February 6, 1909, 35 Stat. 900, 908, which makes the sale of liquor to Indians a crime, provides:

"That the term 'Indians' . . . shall be construed to include the aboriginal tribes inhabiting Alaska when annexed to the United States, and their descendants of the whole or half blood, who have not become citizens of the United States."

The Indians, Eskimos and Aleuts legally fall within the category of Natives of Alaska. In re Minkot, 2 Alaska 200 (1901), 49 F. 2d 992 (1924), 22 F. 2d 207 (1928), 53 F. 2d 203 (1937).

² The Aleut, Iredikka, Curator of Universal Anthropology Smithsonian Institution, in "The Coming of Man from Asia in the Light of Recent Discoveries, Annual Report, Smithsonian Inst. for 1925, II Doc. No. 324, pt. 1, 74th Cong., 2d sess. (1916), p. 460, expresses the opinion that the Eskimo, though a later comer to Alaska, is a blood relation of the Indian.

The Eskimo appears to be a later offshoot from the same old stock that gave us the Indian. He came later, and in two subtypes, one invited to, the other invited from, the Indian. The relation of the Indian and the Eskimo may best perhaps be represented by a hand with outstretched fingers. The diverging fingers are the different types of the Indian, the thumb which should be double, represents the Eskimo. The thumb is farther apart but originates from the same hand, which is the old or paleo-Asiatic yellow-brown skin, a strain that gave us the ancestry of all the aboriginal Americans.

¹⁰ Fifteenth Census of the United States, (including Territories and Possessions), (1912), pt. 19, 20. On October 1, 1927, there were 10,428 Eskimos (including the Aleuts) and 10,055 natives of other linguistic stock. The total population was 50,278, of which the natives total slightly over half, or 29,983. For a discussion of the composition and distribution of the population, see Alaska, Its Resources and Development, II Doc. No. 486, 76th Cong., 2d sess. (1919), pp. 85-88, 153. The uncertainty of much of the contemporary writings on Alaska at the time of its purchase is evidenced by the fact that its population was then variously estimated at from 64,000 to 400,000. Probably the former figure was more nearly accurate, for it was adopted by the "Manuscript of 1867" for 1867 and the "Les Peuples de la Russie" the best authority at that time. It was estimated that there were not more than 8,600

Ocean, the islands of Bering Sea, and the Aleutian chain, and one-third of them live north of the Arctic circle.¹

The Aleuts inhabit the Aleutian Islands and the adjacent mainland, while the Athapascan Indians, perhaps the most primitive, occupy the interior, reaching the coast only at Cook's Inlet.² The coastal Indians, which include the Tlingits,³ a race of maritime nomads, the related Haidas, and the Tsimshians have their Rusians and Creoles, and 8,000 aborigines under the direct government of the Russian American Co., and between 40,000 and 50,000 other aborigines who had only a temporary or casual contact with the company for purposes of trade. XI The Works of Charles Sumner (1875), pp. 261-263.

See 23th of Art. 3, Charter of the Russian American Company defines Creoles as follows:

Children born of a European or Siberian father and a native American mother, in or of a native American father and a European or Siberian mother shall be regarded as creoles, equally with the children of those latter, of whom a special record is preserved. See Ex re Minook, 2 Alaska 299, 314 (1904).

North, Alaska and its Resources (1870), p. 547, estimates that the population of Alaska about 1867 was 29,097, of which 28,814 were natives and 1,121 Creoles or half bloods. At present the mixed-blood population is increasing. XI Encyclopedia of the Social Sciences (1935), p. 260.

SECTION 2. CLASSIFICATION OF NATIVES UNDER RUSSIAN RULE

In determining the status of the natives with respect to civilization and citizenship, the courts have given considerable weight to their ethnology, the state of their civilization and their relationship to the antecedent Russian Government.¹ During the 67 years prior to the acquisition by the United States of Alaska,² the Russian American Company, exercised practically absolute dominion over this country.³ The imperial law of Russia recognized the settled natives, including the Aleuts, Koliuks, Eskimos, and Tlingits, who embraced the Christian faith, as Russian citizens, on the same footing as white subjects.

... the independent tribes of pagan faith who acknowledged no restraint from the Russians, and preferred their ancient customs—were classed as uncivilized native tribes by the Russian law.⁴

The natives reside in small, widely separated villages,⁵ communities, or fishing camps, scattered along the 25,000 miles of coast and on the great rivers, principally along the southern and far northwestern coast. But the most part they do not fall into well-defined tribal groups occupying a fixed geographical area.⁶ Most of them are engaged in hunting and fishing, sometimes supplementing these occupations by agriculture. The raising of reindeer provides subsistence for some and is expected to become more important in their economy.⁷ An increasing number of natives are finding wage employment.⁸

ferred their ancient customs—were classed as uncivilized native tribes by the Russian law.¹

The interest of the Russian Government in trade with the natives,² is indicated by the treaty made with the United States on April 17, 1824,³ which deals incidentally with the natives of Alaska. Article I permitted the citizens of both contracting powers to navigate and fish in the Bering Ocean and Article IV permitted trading with the natives. Article V excepted from this commerce the sale of "intoxicating liquors, firearms, other arms, powder, and munitions of war of every kind." * * *⁴ Several years later, Congress implemented this treaty by the Act of May 19, 1828,⁵ which provided for the punishment of violators of Article V.

SECTION 3. TREATY OF CESSION

Alaska was ceded to the United States by Russia for $7,200,000 in gold by the treaty concluded March 30, 1867.¹ Article III, which deals with the inhabitants makes no distinction based on color or racial origin. It provides:

The Inhabitants of the ceded territory, according to their choice, reserving their natural allegiance, may remain in Russia within three years, but if they should prefer to remain in the ceded territory, they with the exception of uncivilized native tribes, shall be admitted to the enjoyment of all the rights, advantages, and immunities of citizens of the United States, and shall be maintained and protected in the free enjoyment of their liberty, property, and religion. The uncivilized tribes will be subject to such laws and regulations as the United States may, from time to time, adopt in regard to aboriginal tribes of that country.

The Treaty thus divided the Alaskan inhabitants into the following three classes:

- (1) Those who returned to Russia within 3 years, and thereby reserved their natural allegiance;
- (2) Those who remained in the territory, except "uncivilized native tribes"; and
- (3) "Uncivilized native tribes."

¹ 15 Stat. 580. Ratified by the United States May 28, 1867, exchanged June 20, 1867, proclaimed by the United States June 20, 1867. For further details concerning the history of the purchase, see the bibliography cited, pp. 116, 117, in Spicer, op. cit. Also see Clark, op. cit., pp. 60-80.

SECTION 4. SOURCES OF FEDERAL POWER

The primary sources of federal power over the Alaska natives are three:— First, since Alaska is a recognized territory,¹ it is subject to the paramount and plenary authority of Congress to enact laws for the government of the territory and its inhabitants.² Section 3 of the Organic Act of August 21, 1912,³ provides:

"That the Constitution of the United States, and all the laws thereof which are not locally inapplicable, shall have the same force and effect within the said Territory as elsewhere in the United States."

Second, the vacant, unincorporated and unappropriated land at the date of the Cession became a part of the public domain of the United States.⁴ Since 99 percent of Alaska consists of public lands,⁵ the federal control over its property is a vital source of power.

Third, it is said that Congress may enact any legislation it deems proper for the benefit and protection of the natives of Alaska, because they are wards of the United States,⁶ in the sense that they are subject to the plenary power of Congress over Indian affairs.

It has been said that from the viewpoint of constitutional power the question of the Indian or non-Indian origin of the natives is unimportant.⁷ In view of the broad powers over territories and wards, this statement is accurate. However, where the constitutional power is derived from a source wholly applicable to Indians such as the power to regulate commerce with Indian tribes,⁸ the distinction between Indians and non-Indians must be borne in mind.⁹

This exercise of federal power over territories, public property, and wards has been judicially sustained in two cases. The first, the Alaska Pacific Fisheries case,¹⁰ involved the right of the President to issue a proclamation without express statutory authority withdrawing from the public domain the waters adjacent to the Aleutian Islands and reserving the waters within 8,000 feet from the shore at mean low tide. The purpose of this reservation was to develop an Indian fishing industry.¹¹

¹³ The Proclamation of April 28, 1914, 39 Stat. 1777, creating the Aleutian Island Fishery Reserve provides:

"* * * The waters within three thousand feet from the shore lines of mean low tide of all Aleutian Island, from Island, Walker Island, Lewis Island, Spruce Island, Hermit Island, and adjacent rocks and islets, and also the bays of said islands, rocks and islets, are hereby reserved for the benefit of the Metlakatla and such other Alaska natives as have joined them or may join

The Supreme Court of the United States enjoined the defendant corporation from maintaining a fish trap in the navigable waters within the territorial limit, holding that the creation of the reservation was a valid exercise of federal power, and that the reservation included the adjacent submerged land and deep water, supplying fisheries essential to the welfare of the Indians, who might otherwise become a public charge.

The decision was based on the inherent conclusion that Congress intended to assist the Indians in their effort to become self-sustaining and civilized, and that Congress undoubtedly had the power to reserve waters, which were the property of the United States, since it protected the food supply of the Indians. In reaching this decision, the Court stated that it was influenced by the following considerations:

"* * * the circumstances in which the reservation was created, the power of Congress in the premises, the location and character of the islands, the situation and needs of the Indians and the object to be attained." (P. 87.)

The Circuit Court of Appeals in a later case¹² involving the attempt of the Territory of Alaska to encroach upon the federal estate of the Indians by leasing an occupation lay on the output of a private salmon cannery on the Aleutian Island reservation, operating under a lease executed by the Secretary of the Interior, held that the Territory of Alaska was not authorized to levy such a tax, on the ground that the lease was an instrumentality of the Government to assist the Metlakatla Indians to become self-sustaining. The power of the Secretary of the Interior to execute the lease was also sustained.¹³

The exercise of federal power over other natives of Alaska has been similarly upheld. Thus by virtue of his power to supervise the public business relating to Indians, the Secretary of the Interior may supervise a reservation created to enable the Department (through the Bureau of Education) to maintain a school, and may enter into a lease with a third party for the operation of a salmon cannery.¹⁴

Furthermore, even prior to the extension of the Wheeler-Howard Act¹⁵ to Alaska, it was recognized that Congress possessed the power to create Indian reservations in Alaska.¹⁶

When in residence on these islands, to be used by them under the general Fisheries laws, and regulations of the United States as administered by the Secretary of Commerce.

¹² The Court also approved the portion of the regulations, prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior in 1915, reserving the Indians as the only persons to whom permits may be issued in opening salmon traps at these islands. See 25 C. P. R. 1-11 (1915).

SECTION 5. CITIZENSHIP

The Treaty of Cession provided for the collective naturalization of the members of the civilized native tribes of Alaska. Congress implicitly consented to this contract which obligated it to incorporate the inhabitants, except uncivilized tribes, as citizens of the United States, by extending certain laws to the Territory and by passing the Organic Acts of 1881 and 1912.¹

of the natives of Alaska a matter of much doubt and uncertainty. The Minnock case⁴⁰ throws some light on the distinction between civilized and uncivilized tribes. In denying the application for citizenship of the son of a Russian father and an Eskimo mother, and the husband of a native woman, Judge Wickersham held that the applicant was not a Russian citizen though he was born in Alaska in 1840, and, together with his parents, was a member of the Greek Church and a subject of Russia at the time of the census. "The court held that Minnock was a citizen of the United States by virtue of the third article of the treaty with Russia, either as one of those inhabitants who accepted the benefits of the proffered naturalization, or as a member of an uncivilized native tribe who has voluntarily taken up his residence separate from any tribe of Indians and has adopted the habits of civilized life."⁴¹

In order to discover the intentions of the signatory nations, Judge Wickersham quoted and discussed portions of the charter of the Russian American Co. He also drew upon the science of ethnology to determine whether the tribe was civilized and quoted Prof. W. H. Dall⁴² of the Smithsonian Institution, as to which natives were civilized. The next year he quoted with approval portions from this opinion and again used the same technique to prove that natives belonging to the Athapascan stock were uncivilized at the time of the census and hence, as wards of the Government, were entitled to an injunction against the repossess of white men on their property.⁴³

SECTION 6. STATUS OF NATIVES

The legal position of the individual Alaskan natives has been generally assimilated to that of the Indians in the United States.⁴⁴ It is now substantially established that they occupy the same relation to the Federal Government as do the Indians residing in the United States; that they, their property, and their affairs are under the protection of the Federal Government; that Congress may enact such legislation as it deems fit for their benefit and protection; and that the laws of the United States with respect to the Indians resident within the boundaries of the United States proper are generally applicable to the Alaskan natives.⁴⁵

For example, it has been administratively held that the general laws enacted by Congress empowering the Secretary of the Interior to prohibit the estates of deceased Indians are applicable to Alaskan natives.⁴⁶

"I speak appropriations for the education and medical welfare of the natives of Alaska. . . . can be heard only upon the theory that the Government, and therefore Congress, owes a special duty to the natives of Alaska (C. 189). . . . is analogous to that owed by a guardian to his ward, a trustee to the beneficiaries of the trust, or a father to his children. (P. 185). . . . the Government . . . is bound in honor and good morals, to meet suitable measures for their benefit and their economic welfare. (P. 185)."

Alaskan natives the status of citizenship: (1) Allottees, and (2) nonallottees who severed tribal relationship and adopted the habits of civilization.⁴⁷

The Territorial Act of April 27, 1915,⁴⁸ provided a method whereby a nonallottee could secure a certificate of citizenship.⁴⁹ This procedure included proof of his general qualifications as a voter, his total abandonment of tribal customs, and his adoption of the culture of civilization.

This statute became obsolete with the passage of the Citizenship Act,⁵⁰ which included the Alaskan natives,⁵¹ and was finally repealed in 1935.⁵²

In the case of United States v. Launch,⁵³ the court held that though the members of the Tlingit tribe would undoubtedly have been classed as uncivilized, under the provisions of Article III of the Treaty of Cession, they, together with other native Indian tribes of the Territory of Alaska, were collectively naturalized by the Citizenship Act. Consequently, proof of civilization is no longer a condition precedent to citizenship.

⁴⁸ The case of Stude v. United States, 191 Fed. 141 (C. C. A. 9, 1911), held that sec. 6 of the Act of February 8, 1887, 24 Stat. 388, 100, known as the General Allotment Act in confining citizenship on Indians who severed their tribal relation and adopted the habits and customs of civilized life, applied to the Territory of Alaska. Contra In re Jones position of James Johnson, 2 Alaska 558 (1906).

The placing of the Alaskan natives on the same footing as other American Indians was the culmination of a shifting policy which has been well described in an opinion of the Solicitor for the Department of the Interior:⁵⁵

In the beginning, and for a long time after the cession of this Territory Congress took no particular notice of these natives, but never intended to hamper their individual movements, confine them to a locality or reservation, or to place them under the immediate control of its officers, as has been the case with the American Indians, and no special provisions were made for their support and education until comparatively recently. And in the earlier days it was repeatedly held by the courts and the Attorney General that these natives did not bear the same relation to our Government, in many respects, that was borne by the American Indians. (16 Op. Atty. Gen., 111; 18 id., 159); United States v. Peacock Revell (4 Sawyer U. S., 311); Dugh Waters v. James B. Campbell (4 Sawyer U. S., 121); John B. Smith et al. (19 L. D., 323).

With the exception of the act of March 3, 1901 (26 Stat., 1095, 1101), which set apart the Aleutian Islands as a reservation for the use of the Aleutians, a band of British Columbian natives, who immigrated into Alaska in a body, and also except the authorization given to the Secretary of the Interior to make reservations for landing places for the canoes and boats of the natives, Congress has not created or directly authorized the creation of reservations of any other character for them.

It ruled that although the provisions of the Act of June 25, 1910, 36 Stat. 885, as amended, which relates to the administration of the restricted property of deceased Indians, are applicable to Alaskan natives, a subordinate officer, such as an employee of the Reindeer Service, lacks the power to settle such estates.

⁵⁵ 49 L. D. 892, 894-895 (1923). This portion of the opinion was quoted with approval in 53 L. D. 803 (1922). Also see 51 L. D. 89 (1920), 50 L. D. 838, 824-825 (1924).

Later, however, Congress began to directly recognize these natives as being, to a very considerable extent at least, under our Government's guardianship and enacted laws which placed them in the possession of the lands they occupied, made provision for the allotment of lands to them, and, in every way, sought to make them able to support themselves. The Government also gave them special hunting, fishing and other particular privileges to enable them to support themselves, and supplied them with rations and instructions as to their preparation. Congress has also supplied funds to give these natives medical and hospital treatment, and has made provision for their education. Appropriations to defray the expenses of both their education and their support.

Not only has Congress in this manner treated these natives as being wards of the Government but they have been repeatedly so recognized by the courts. See Alaska Pacific Fisheries v. United States (248 U. S. 78), United States v. Corrigan et al (12 Alaska Reports, 442), United States v. Cadou et al (15 id., 125), and the unpublished decision of the District Court of Alaska, Division No. 1, in the case of Territory of Alaska v. Innuit Islands Packing Company et al, rendered June 15, 1922.

From this it will be seen that these natives are now unquestionably considered and treated as being under the guardianship and protection of the Federal Government at least to such an extent as to bring them within the spirit, if not within the exact letter, of the laws relative to the education of the children of the United States. By the fact that in creating the territorial government of Alaska and vesting that territory with the powers of legislation and control over its internal affairs, including public schools, Congress expressly excluded from that legislation and control the schools maintained for the natives, and decided that such schools should continue to be maintained under the control of the Secretary of the Interior.

An explanation of the reasons for this changing policy will be helpful in understanding the legal position of the Alaskan natives. The United States at first followed the example of Russia. From 1807 to 1884, when the Organic Act of 1884⁴⁰ made Alaska a civil and judicial district, this vast land had hardly the shadow of a civil government and was little more than a geographical subdivision of the United States.⁴¹ Save for the occasional activity of the military authorities, the natives shifted for themselves.⁴² This neglect is indicated by the failure of the United States to provide a regular agent for them, as in the case of Indians generally. The responsible duties of such an official were delegated to a military commandant.⁴³

One of the few exceptions to the failure to enact legislation was the extension of prohibitory liquor laws to Alaska.⁶¹ However, these laws were flagrantly violated and little attempt to enforce them was made during the first two decades of American rule.⁶²

Although the purchase of Alaska on June 20, 1897, occurred while the United States still was making treaties with Indian tribes,⁶⁰ no attempt was made to enter into treaties with the nalives. This was primarily because the reasons which were responsible for treaty making by the Federal Government with the American Indians¹ were not present in Alaska, where there was plenty of land and little danger of serious hostilities. Alaska was not considered Indian country² until 1878 when sections 20 and 21 of the Trade and Intercourse Act,³ prohibiting liquor traffic in Indian country and with the Indians, were extended to include this territory. There was therefore no necessity for statutes and treaties extinguishing Indian title. The legal theory was adopted of considering those Indians subjects and not dependent or domestic nations having titles to be extinguished. Reservations were not established with the exception of the Ammette Island Reservation and those for educational purposes.⁴

There was an absence of federal laws in most fields¹¹ and even the few which were considered applicable to Alaska were not enforced. Questions concerning the effect of tribal laws and customs were rarely raised. *In re Sub Quah*¹² was one of the few cases in which this issue was directly involved. In granting a writ of habeas corpus to the petitioner, a slave of a Thlingit Indian, the court said:

What, then, has the real value of Alaska Indians? Many of them have converted themselves into the members of churches, maintained a great interest in the education of their youth, and have adopted civilized habits of life. Their condition has been gradually changing until the attributes of their original sovereignty have been lost, and they are becoming more and more dependent upon and subject to the laws of the United States, and yet they are not citizens within the full meaning of that term. (P. 328-329)

The United States has at no time recognized an initial independence or relations among these Indians, has never treated with them in any capacity, but from every act of congress in relation to the people of this territory it is clearly manifest that they have been and now are regarded as a conquered and dependent people, and as such, the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction of its courts. Upon a careful examination of the habits of these natives, of their modes of living, and their traditions, I am inclined to the opinion that their system is essentially patriarchal, and that they are in the same relation to the United States as other Indians. They are practically in a state of vassalage, and sustain a relation to the United States similar to that of a vassal to a garrison, and have no such independence or sovereignty as will permit them to sustain a relation to the United States as an independent nation, with the fundamental laws of the United States. (P. 828)

Nevertheless, tribal custom and law is recognized in some cases.⁷³ In the absence of federal legislation, a marriage between the natives belonging to the uncivilized tribes, such as the Athapascans, when entered into according to long-established

In considering the application to Alaskan natives of laws relating to Indians it is well to bear in mind the following point: "The laws which regulate specifically in Alaska naturally differ from those which regulate in this country," and define them (including Indians, Eskimos, Aleuts, and other aboriginal tribes, Alaskan Indians of small towns at the Alaska Reorganization Act, the act authorizing the sale of liquor in districts to Indians in Alaska (see 112 Cong. R., Act of March 3, 1899, 30 Stat. 1251) and various acts appropriating funds for the education of the natives. However, report of the Director of the Division of Territories and Island Possessions, Department of the Interior, for 1909 lists the "protection of the welfare of the native population," as the first of the "immediate considerations for the attainment of major ends." The Director, Dr. Rhoads Greening, later Governor of Alaska, also wrote:

The extension of the economic and social benefits of the Indian reorganization act to Alaska has paved the way for the security of approximately one-half of the present population of the Territory, whose stabilized future is not only an essential act of humanitarianism but also an important item of wholesome advance."

in the case of the application to the natives of laws drafted to cover the Indians in the United States, it is apparent that the law itself will refer only to "Indians," and the words there must be understood that the laws relating to Indians in the United States are applicable to the natives in Alaska in so far as they are consistent with the circumstances of the case. The act (and one example of such a law is the Indian Citizenship Act of June 2, 1924 (43 Stat. 2531, House Sess. 1-1) June 2, 1917.

SECTION 7. EDUCATION⁵

From 1854 to March 16, 1881, the Bureau of Education,⁶ rather than the Office of Indian Affairs, controlled native education and welfare work. Such service presents peculiarly difficult and important administrative problems.

The area of Alaska is about one-fifth the size of the United States. Many settlements are beyond the limits of transportation and require mail service, and one-third of the natives live north of the Arctic Circle.⁷ Villages are usually far apart and transportation is largely limited to boats on coastal waters, dog teams for interior travel, and neoplanes. Even on the coast and rivers, boats are infrequent, and in the winter can be used only in the south.

Neither the federal control over education on reservations, nor the system of annuities for educational purposes, nor the boarding school program was carried into this Territory. The population of commerce, and instruction in hand management were indicated with the educational system for northern and western Alaska.⁸ Vocational training was also established.⁹

Reservations have been created which are devoted to educational purposes,¹⁰ and are in diverse activities as native assistance

⁵See Chapter 12, sec. 2. For a discussion of native education see 1911-12 (1912), also see Spicer, op. cit. pp. 97-101, Alaska: Its Resources and Development, op. cit. pp. 11-11, Anderson and Bell, op. cit. p. 2.

⁶Now known as the United States Office of Education. See Cook, Public Education in Alaska, Bull. No. 12 (1916), Office of Education, Department of Interior, pp. 26-31.

⁷Commissioner of Indian Affairs (1909), in his annual report for 1911, wrote:

The administrative change which by responsibility for education in Alaska was transferred to the Office of Indian Affairs in March 1902, is undoubtedly important as an indication of a national unified policy for the education of various indigenous groups. Most important in this, however, is the fact that the Alaskan educational enterprise has been carried out in the past with a different philosophy and different practice. In contrast to the Indian Service, with its boarding schools, the Office of Education in Alaska until very recently confined its efforts to local communities, schools and programs of education that took into account in an indirect way the health and social and economic life of the native group. The Alaskan program, therefore, represented the other extreme from the Indian policy in the States. (P. 12.)

on road building¹¹ and the leasing of chambers¹² have been instituted as incidental to education.

Originally no differentiation was made between the education of the natives and the whites.¹³ As a result of the Act of February 27, 1906,¹⁴ a dual system of education was instituted, one part was mainly devoted to white children and the other to the children of the Natives.¹⁵

The interpretation of the term "civilization" as used in this statute was an issue in the case of Myers v. Hula School Board.¹⁶ In denying the petition for a writ of mandamus to require the school board to admit the plaintiff's children who were of mixed blood, the court took the view that civilization is achieved only when the natives have adopted the white man's way of life and associated with white men and women.¹⁷

¹³The Organic Act of 1884 (Act of May 17, 1884, sec. 13, 21 Stat. 213), authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to provide for "the education of the children of school age in the Territory of Alaska, without reference to race." * * * This phrase was repeated in other enabling acts, such as the Act of March 3, 1899, 40 Stat. 1074, 1101, 41 Stat. 616, 619, see 7.

* * * as to whether or not the persons in question have stepped aside from old associations, former habits of life, and modes of existence, in other words, have exchanged the old barbaric, uncivilized conditions for the changed, new, and so different as to indicate an advanced and improved condition of mind, which denotes, and reaches out for something altogether different and unlike the old life.

Civilization * * * includes * * * more than a progressive business, a trade, a house, what man's clothes, and membership in a church. (P. 491.)

The attitude of the court toward the native culture is brought out in the case of In re Oona-hi Conyung, 20 Fed. 687 (D. C. Alaska 1887), involving the rights of a mother of a child attending a mission school. This case is discussed in Chapter 12, infra.

¹⁶Considerable stress was placed on the fact that the plaintiffs of the children were native and that the children joined in the hunting

The territorial legislature was first granted power over schools by the Act of March 3, 1917,¹⁴ which empowered it "to establish and maintain schools for white and colored children and children of mixed blood who lead a civilized life Pursuant to this act a writ of mandamus was granted¹⁵ compelling the city of Ketchikan, Alaska, to admit to its schools attended by the whites a resident child of mixed blood who led a civilized life, although she could attend an Indian school in the city, and thereby make room for the attendance of non-resident white children. The court said:

The legislative power of the territory of Alaska with regard to schools derived from this section makes no provision as to the segregation of children, nor does it refer to the race or color of the children to be provided for in the municipal schools, and such act must necessarily be construed in the light of the section quoted limiting the authority of the Legislature to provide schools for white and colored children and children of mixed blood (P. 147).

Only mission schools existed before 1867, the date of the purchase of Alaska, and 1884.¹⁶ Thereafter, until 1900, annual federal appropriations, ranging from a few thousand dollars to $60,000, were made for the education of native and white children.¹⁷ For the next 7 years education was supported by a license tax. Schools in incorporated towns were under local control, while the Secretary of the Interior continued to direct rural schools. Beginning with 1907, annual appropriations in increasing amounts were made enabling the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, to provide for the education and support of the natives of Alaska.¹⁸ The territorial schools established in 1905 were supported by territorial and federal funds and fishing expeditions of the native bands. Apparently the court did not recognize that hunting and fishing were iterations of social significance among the whites and a source of livelihood for some whites and many natives.

Some appropriation acts, during this period, authorized the Secretary of the Interior to use a specified sum from the general education appropriation "for the education of Indians in Alaska," e.g., Act of March 2, 1885, 28 Stat. 876, 884.

and served white children and "children of mixed blood who lead a civilized life."¹⁹

The Indian Service maintains schools in approximately 100 villages.²⁰ During the fiscal year 1931-1932, 4,383 native children were enrolled in the federal schools, 1,874 in the territorial schools, and approximately 1,000 in mission schools.²¹

By the Act of May 14, 1930,²² the Secretary of the Interior was authorized to contract with school boards which maintained schools in certain cities and towns to educate children of non-tribal natives, including those of mixed native and white blood, to lease school buildings owned by the United States Government to such boards, and to pay such boards for services rendered an amount not in excess of the cost of operating a school for natives under present appropriations in such town.

Chapter 85, Laws of Alaska, 1915, authorized the Territorial Board of Administration of the Territory of Alaska to enter into a contract or contracts with the Secretary of the Interior for educational and welfare work among the Alaskan natives.²³

The Act of May 31, 1938,²⁴ authorized the Secretary of the Interior to withdraw and permanently reserve small tracts of land not exceeding 640 acres each, of the public domain in Alaska for schools, hospitals, and other necessary purposes in administering the affairs of the natives.²⁵

Congress has recognized that in many places the Alaska school service is the only federal agency in daily contact with the natives. The Act of March 3, 1909,²⁶ authorized the Attorney General to appoint as special peace officers employees of the educational service designated by the Secretary of the Interior. These officers were endowed with the ordinary authority of a policeman to arrest natives charged with the violation of any provision of the Criminal Code of Alaska or white men charged with the violation of any of its provisions to the detriment of any native of the Territory.²⁷

SECTION 8. PROPERTY RIGHTS

Problems relating to the property rights of Alaskan natives arise out of their activities in hunting and fishing, their use and ownership of land and their ownership of reindeer. Land, except mineral land, is comparatively unimportant in the Alaskan economy.²⁸ This is due to the fact that the population is sparse (averaging one person per 10 square miles)²⁹ and that most of the land is unsuitable for agriculture.³⁰ Therefore, much greater attention must be paid to other forms of property.

A FISHING AND HUNTING RIGHTS³¹

Fishing is the most important industry of Alaska³² and from time immemorial has been the principal source of food for the natives.¹¹¹ "For production is third in value of all commodities in Alaska as to total value."¹¹² Fur trading was the primary occupation of the Russians who came to Alaska during the latter half of the eighteenth century.¹¹³ Since that time the natives have depended on fur trading for a substantial part of their livelihood.¹¹⁴

The Bureau of Fisheries, formerly with the approval of the Secretary of Commerce, and now with that of the Secretary of the Interior, drafts fishing regulations respecting the areas in which traps may be operated, and then number "A" license for a trap must be obtained from the territorial treasurer, and to prevent obstructions to navigation, the Secretary of War must authorize the plans. In 1927 the number of traps in operation reached almost 800, but there has subsequently been a steady decline in this figure.

Judicial and legislative cognizance has been taken of the importance of fishing and hunting in the native economy. The Supreme Court of the United States in the Alaska Pacific Fisheries case¹¹⁵ said:

They (the Metlakathlans) were largely fishermen and hunters, accustomed to live from the returns of those vocations, and looked upon the islands as a suitable location for their country, located on the delta adjacent to the shore would afford a primary means of subsistence and a promising opportunity for individual and commercial development. Also see reports on Alaskan fishing and fur seal industry, collected in Bulletin of the Bureau of Fisheries, vol. XLVII, No. 18 (1938).

In many conservation statutes the natives are given special privileges. The Act of July 1, 1870,¹¹⁷ makes unlawful the killing of fur seals upon the Pribilof Islands, except during the months of June, July, September, and October in each year, and the killing of such seals at any time by firearms. The privilege of killing young seals necessary for food and clothing and old seals necessary for clothing and boats by the natives for their own use was permitted, subject to regulations of the Secretary of the Treasury.¹¹⁸

The validity of section 6 of the Act of July 27, 1908,¹¹⁹ which prohibits the killing of fur-bearing animals within the limits of the Territory, or in the waters thereof and empowers the court, in its discretion, to confiscate vessels violating this statute, was upheld in *The James B. Smith*¹²⁰ case. The court sustained the libel for the forfeiture of a boat owned by an Indian of the Malah Tribe, despite the contention that such forfeiture violated a treaty with this tribe.¹²¹

The Act of April 6, 1904,¹²² prohibits the killing of fur seals by United States citizens in waters of the Pacific Ocean surrounding the Pribilof Islands. It also prohibits the killing of fur seals from May 1 to July 31 in a circumscribed part of the Pacific Ocean, including Bering Sea.¹²³

Section 6 permits Indians dwelling on the coasts of the United States to take fur-bearing seals in open, unimproved boats not manned by more than five persons using primitive methods, excluding firearms. Such fishing may not be done pursuant to a contract of employment.¹²⁴ The Act of December 29, 1907,¹²⁵ prohibiting the taking of fur seals in the North Pacific Ocean contained a similar provision.

Section 3 of the Act of April 22, 1910,¹²⁶ provides that whenever seals are taken, the natives of the Pribilof Islands shall be employed in such killing and shall receive full compensation. Section 6 permits the natives of these islands to kill such young seals as may be necessary for their own clothing and the manufacture of boats for their own use, subject to regulations prescribed by the Secretary of Commerce. Section 9 authorizes the official to furnish food, clothing, shelter, and other necessities to the native inhabitants and to provide for their education.¹²⁷

As early as 1802 Congress passed conservation legislation containing special exceptions for the natives of Alaska and the white residents. The Act of June 7, 1902,¹¹ as amended by the Act of May 17, 1908,¹² prohibits the wanton destruction of wild game animals or wild birds for the purpose of shipment from Alaska. It also provides that—

Nothing in this Act shall . . . prevent the killing of any game animal or bird for food or clothing at any time by natives, or by hunters or explorers, when in need of food, but the game animals or birds so killed during closed season shall not be shipped or sold.

Section 1 of the Act of June 14, 1900,¹³ as amended by the Act of June 25, 1938,¹⁴ without changing the provisions respecting natives, prohibits all companies, corporations, or associations not authorized to transact business under federal, state, or territorial laws and aliens without first permits, from catching or killing, except with rod, spear, or gaff, any fish of any kind or species in any of the waters of Alaska under the jurisdiction of the United States. By amendments to section 4 of the act for the protection and regulation of the fisheries of Alaska,¹⁵ killing at any species of salmon except by hand, rod, spear, or gaff in any streams of Alaska at any time month, is unlawful excepting in the Kasiluk, Unalakleet, Yakutat, and Kuskokwim Rivers. The exception of the two last-named rivers is applicable only to native Indians and permanent white inhabitants taking, using salmon under conditions provided by the Secretary of Commerce now by the Secretary of the Interior.¹⁶

Article II, clause 3, of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain for the protection of migratory birds in the United States and Canada provides:¹⁷

The close season on other migratory nongame birds shall continue throughout the year, except that Eskimos and Indians may take at any season ducks, snipe, quail, geese, and ptarmigan, and their eggs, for food and their skins for clothing, but the birds and eggs so taken shall not be sold or offered for sale.

Regulations prohibiting the killing of whales, walrus, and sea lions have special provisions regarding natives.¹⁸ Many other rules regarding refuges and hunting of migratory birds grant special privileges to the natives.¹⁹

The Alaska Game Law²⁰ regulates the taking of food game during the regular season, but exempts the natives from the necessity of securing hunting and trapping permits in denials licenses. Native cooperatives or mission stores are also exempt.²¹ And, subject to regulations of the Secretary of the Interior regarding animals whose extinction is imminent, the law permits them to take game during the closed season when in absolute need of food and other game is not available.²² Section 8 empowers the Secretary of Agriculture, now Secretary of the Interior to safeguard the livelihood of the natives and conserve the fur animals requiring nonresident hunters to reside 3 years in the territory instead of one, before becoming eligible for resident trapping license.

herds of reindeer.¹²⁰ The animals were first introduced into Alaska from Siberia from 1801 to 1802 by Dr Sheldon Jackson, the United States General Agent in Alaska.¹²¹ The original purpose of importation was to augment the dwindling source of native food supply consisting of game and fish, which had been seriously depleted by the whites. The total importation by 1902, when shipments ceased, was about 1,280 head, and by 1933 the original stock expanded into a reindeer population estimated at 600,000 head.¹²²

The Federal Government, in recent years, has conducted numerous experiments on the cross-breeding of reindeer and native caribou,¹²³ on the control of predatory enemies, and on reindeer grazing.¹²⁴

The Federal Government has passed many statutes to protect the natives against food shortage due to periodic depletion of game or sea food and to encourage the raising of reindeer for their own subsistence and eventually for sale on the market.¹²⁵

¹²¹ The District Court considered the importance of the reindeer to the natives in the construction of the Act of April 27, 1904, 33 Stat. 381, 702, 393, which provided that each road overseer in Alaska shall require all male persons between the ages of 18 and 50 to work on the public roads for 2 days or to be subject to a road tax. In the exercise of the overseer, the tax could be performed by the man with a team of dogs, horses, or "a reindeer team of not less than two reindeer and sleigh or cart." In holding that an Alaskan was subject to that duty the court said that the legislative intent to include the Eskimo was shown by the portions concerning reindeer. *United States v. The Fifteenth Census of the United States, Outlying Territories and Possessions (1922), p. 80, contains an estimate of 712,500 reindeer as of 1910. No longer, as in the past, in danger of starvation, some of the Eskimos have gained a livelihood by raising reindeer. Alaska, Its Resources and Development, op. cit. p. 41. Although it has been estimated that the Territory was capable of raising between three and four million animals (Reindeer of Bureau of Biological Survey. The Bureau of Education estimated ten million. Cameron, op. cit. p. 137), the predatory animals like wolves and coyotes have in recent years killed many reindeer, especially on the Arctic tundra. This menace imposed because the reindeer, formerly herded by attendants, have been allowed in recent years to roam, and are correlated only at certain seasons. By this change in herd management the reindeer scatter widely over the tundra, and increasing numbers of wolves and coyotes have seriously mistreated the industry. The territorial legislature, by apical hunting appropriations, has cooperated with the Reindeer Service, the Forest Service, Office of Indian Affairs, the Alaska Game Commission, and the Bureau of Biological Survey, which, since 1937, has resumed its work in investigating and reducing depredations of predatory animals. (Report of the Chief of the Bureau of Biological Survey (1937), pp. 56, 59-60. Id. (1938), p. 98.) Despite these efforts toward predator control, a recent survey indicated that coyotes and wolves are increasing, and that their depredations on reindeer herds are becoming more serious. Ibid. (1939), p. 67.

Alaska, Its Resources and Development,

"The Bureau of Indian Affairs" gives instructions to the natives and distributes reindeer on terms which enable them eventually to acquire a qualified ownership. The Government, however, retains a reversionary ownership so that an act of the territorial legislature imposing a tax upon each reindeer killed for market was held unapplicable to reindeer killed for market by natives of Alaska.¹²⁶

It has been administratively held¹²⁷ that Congress had conferred upon the Secretary of the Interior the power to make regulations and impose restrictions upon the disposition of reindeer transferred to the natives by the Government, and these regulations may be enforced by suit to recover the annual illegally transferred or its value.

Despite the safeguards created by statute and administrative rules, by 1920 about a quarter of all the reindeer in Alaska was owned by whites.¹²⁸

The most important law relating to reindeer is the Act of September 1, 1897,¹²⁹ which is designed to establish for the natives of Alaska a self-sustaining economy by acquiring for them the whole reindeer business, and to develop native activity in all branches of the industry. The Secretary of the Interior is empowered to acquire by purchase or other lawful means, including condemnation, "reindeer, reindeer-equipment, materials, cold-storage plants, warehouses, and other property, real or personal, the acquisition of which he determines to be necessary in the effectuation of the purposes of this Act" (see 2), and to make distribution thereof to the natives or to their organizations¹³⁰ under such conditions as he may prescribe (see 8). He is also

The following discussion by the Solicitor of the regulations gives an idea of the administrative system:

"As has already been indicated, the absolute ownership of all reindeer in Alaska was in the Government originally, and such interests in them as are held by the natives grow out of contractual relations between the individual natives and the United States, based on regulations based for that purpose. By these regulations the natives who hold reindeer are divided into two classes, one known as "apprentices," to whom a stated number of reindeer are apportioned by the Government from its herds, and the other as "herders." The regulations provided that the reindeer issued to these natives shall revert to the Government in the case of the death of either an apprentice or a herder without heirs, or with heirs who are not competent or do not manifest a desire to take charge of the herd, or in the case of an apprentice who is married, or where a herder becomes incompetent and fails to reform within one year, or continually neglects his herd, and the members of his family are not competent to control the herd and fail to provide a competent herder.

Both apprentices and herders are required to enter into a contract with the Government, of which the regulations mentioned are made a part, and in which there are other stipulations calling for the reversion of the herd to the Government under certain contingencies.

¹¹¹ This section provides in part:

"That the Indians or other persons in said district shall not be disturbed in the possession of any lands actually in their use or occupation or now claimed by them, but the terms under which such persons may be disturbed in such lands is reserved for future legislation by Congress."

Section 12 empowers the Secretary of the Interior to select two officers, who together with the Governor shall constitute a Commission to examine and report on the condition of the Indians, "what lands, if any, should be reserved for their use," etc.

States relating to mining claims is the first legislation which recognizes the rights of Alaska Indians to the possession of lands in their actual use and occupancy.¹¹² In interpreting this provision, the court in Heckman v. Butler, said:

The prohibition contained in the act of 1884 against the disturbance of the use of possession of any Indian or other person of any land in Alaska claimed by them is sufficiently general and comprehensive to include idle lands as well as lands above high-water mark. Not is it sufficient that Congress, in first dealing with the then sparsely settled country, was disposed to protect its few inhabitants in the possession of lands, of whatever character, by means of which they eeked out their hard and precarious existence. The fact that at that time the Indians and other occupants of the country largely made their use by means of hunting and the well known to the legislative mind of the government, as well as the fact that that business, if conducted on any substantial scale, necessitated the use of parts of the idle lands in the milking out and hauling in of the necessary supplies. Congress saw proper to protect by its act of 1884 the possession and use by these Indians and other persons of any and all land in Alaska against intrusion by third persons, and so far has never deemed it wise to otherwise provide. (Pp 88-89)

A subsequent judicial decision¹¹³ also stresses the importance of interpreting the statute in the light of the communal habits of the natives.

It is well known that the native Indians of this country by their peculiar habits live in villages here and there, in some of which they remain and in others of which they are during certain seasons nomadic, that while their habits are somewhat nomadic, they have well-settled places of abode, and these usually are not abandoned, though they thus vacate them for a few seasons at a time. The history of the habits of these people is well understood. (P 229)

It is believed that the language of this act does not refer to lands held by Indians in severalty, but as to holdings by them collectively in their villages and such places as were occupied by them, that their methods of life were well understood by the lawmakers, and that they were understood to occupy lands in common either in villages where they lived, or in fishing, hunting, and like places.

No doubt I think exists as to the rights of those Indians who had occupied some particular tract of land solely and exclusively by themselves, and had actually occupied the same continuously before the time and since the passage of the act of May 17, 1884. I could maintain his possessory right to this property by virtue of this act, and the rights of the native might and should have possessory lands such circumstances. But it is evident to the court that the native Indians who occupied the land in dispute, if they occupied it exclusively and continuously, if they were in the actual undisputed possession thereof at the time the act of 1884 went into effect, were occupying it as a village, where a number had settled, and were there as common occupants, and not as individual claimants to any particular portion of the same. If they occupied the same exclusively as a village or otherwise, their right to the same must be protected, if protected at all, under section 8, above referred to. If the Congress of the United States have made no provision for this class of incidents acquiring title to lands since the act of 1884, then they may not obtain title. (Pp. 229-230)

Congress had a purpose in withholding from those Indians the title to their possessions, especially with respect to mining claims. It protects them in their possessions under the legal title held by the United States by the treaty of cession, but it does not mean that they shall not be disturbed in the possession of any lands

This act protects land held by Indians and other persons in Alaska at the time of its passage and not lands subsequently acquired,¹²⁰ nor land occupied within a public reservation.¹²¹

The Act of March 3, 1881,¹²² which extends the Homestead Law to Alaska and provides for the acquisition by an individual group or association of 160 acres of land for trade or manufacturing purposes, expressly excepts "any lands . . . to which the natives of Alaska have prior rights by virtue of actual occupation . . ." "The possessory rights of the natives cannot be interrupted by the granting of townships."

Section 1 of the Act of May 26, 1906,¹²³ authorizes the township trustee to issue a restricted deed to an Alaskan native for a tract in a township occupied and set apart for him. Section 3 provides that whenever the Secretary of the Interior "shall find unoccupied public lands to be claimed and occupied by natives, as a town or village, he may issue a patent therefor to a native who shall convey by restricted deed such land to the individual native, exclusive of his enclosed by streets or alleys."

The determination of persons eligible to receive patents under this act was delegated to the Department of the Interior, which has frequently changed its interpretation of the natives eligible to acquire title to the public domain. Regulations¹²⁴ were promulgated providing that the act applied only to natives who had not seemed of citizenship under the Territorial Law.¹²⁵ Although the wisdom of permitting the issuance of unrestricted deeds to natives, solely because of their citizenship was questioned,¹²⁶ such regulations were authorized by law.¹²⁷

Though the statute provided that all of the deeds should contain restrictions on alienation, levy, sale, and encumbrance, the township trustees exercised discretion as to whether natives should receive restricted or unrestricted deeds, and they reached an understanding with the General Land Office that natives leading a civilized life should be treated in all respects as white citizens, but that the lands possessed by other Indians or natives should not be assessed nor conveyed but should be set apart for them as Indian possessions.¹²⁸

Section 10 of the Act of May 14, 1898,¹²⁹ extending the homestead laws of the United States to Alaska, authorizes the Secretary of the Interior to reserve for the use of the natives of Alaska, suitable tracts of land along the water front of any stream, inlet, bay, or sea shore for landing places for canoes and other craft used by such natives . . .

or (usually) in their actual use or occupation, or claimed by them at the date of that act.

Such recognition by Congress of a right of occupancy and possession prevents the acquisition of title to such lands without legislative authority, and while the title remains in the Government the Indians' right to occupancy cannot be impaired nor can the land be surveyed for sale or charged or burdened with any obligation or encumbrance that would not be lawfully imposed upon public lands of the United States or other lands to which it holds the title. It was obviously contemplated by the act that these Indians should enjoy title and privilege of a land owner except the title to encumber the land or to convey title thereto.

¹²⁹ Memo. Acting Sol. I. D., February 17, 1939.

Title to such reserved land cannot be acquired by any individual or group of individuals, even with Indian consent.¹³¹

In the case of United States v. Lynch,¹³² it was held that an order of the Secretary of the Interior reserving certain Indian lands for a landing place for the boats of the natives did not reserve any land for any particular natives and that the United States was the proper party to sue in an action of trespass. The court stressed the communal nature of the life and occupation of the Indians as it made to congressional intention.

There has been no legislation by Congress particularly pertaining to the lands occupied by the Indians of Alaska on May 7, 1884. It is true that there is a provision for the Indians of the United States to enter lands under the Homestead Act, 24 Stat. 106 (43 U. S. C. A. § 180). This act is also applicable to the Indians of Alaska who may enter lands under the Homestead Act, but the entry of lands under the Homestead Act is necessarily restricted to lands above the line of ordinary high-water mark. There is no specific provision of legislation relative to the acquisition of title to public lands by Indians occupying them on May 17, 1884, that I am aware of.¹³³ (P. 373.)

Section 27 of the Act of June 6, 1900,¹³⁴ establishing a civil government in Alaska, provides that—

The Indians . . . shall not be disturbed in the possession of any lands now actually in their use or occupation,

The case of *United States v. Brington*¹³⁵ held that this statute not only prohibits an entry, under the Land Laws, upon land occupied by the natives but also forbids any other action which will disturb their possession and encumbrance, and any attempt to dispossess them by contract. The court also held that the United States, and not an individual Indian, was the proper party to sue on a mandatory injunction against trespass on Indian land.

Under the Act of May 17, 1908,¹³⁶ the Secretary of the Interior may allot nonreserved land not exceeding 160 acres to any native who is the head of a family or who is 21 years of age. It also provides that such allotment shall be deemed the homestead of the allottee and his heirs forever and shall be inalienable and non-taxable until Congress provides otherwise.

Title remains in the United States,¹³⁷ and monies received from trespass on timber on such allotted land is not paid to the allottee, but must be deposited in the public funds of the United States.¹³⁸

After the approval of an allotment, the allottee's rights are

¹³³ An administrative finding, 50 L. D. 715, 817-818 (1924), interpreting this provision, states:

. . . there is no authority under existing law by which these lands can be sold . . . As previously shown, until Congress grants some statute title, the right of the natives in Alaska is simply one of use and occupancy. Nor does the reservation of a designated area for their benefit result in placing actual title in the Indians . . . the title or other lands occupied by or reserved for the Indians at Kotikchan, Alaska, cannot be disposed of under existing law but that the power rests with Congress, by statute, with or without the consent of the Indians, to provide in the future disposal of these lands.

not defeated by a subsequent reservation by Executive order of a tract of land, which includes the allotment.²⁰

In the words of a recent administrative holding²¹:

That Congress did not intend that an allottee's right should be less than a "vested right," or be subject to extinction at the pleasure of the Executive branch of the Government, is very clearly shown by the fact that it went further in the act conferring that right than it has done in other kindred statutes by declaring in emphatic words that "the land so allotted shall be deemed the homestead of the allottee and his heirs in perpetuity."

Actual occupancy and continuous use of a tract of land by a native, prior to its inclusion within a national forest, confers upon the occupant a preference right to an allotment, even though the application for an allotment was filed subsequent to the creation of a reservation.²²

The Allotment Act²³ does not limit the use of the land by the allottee nor the duration of his occupancy, nor the character of his improvements.²⁴

The Secretary of the Interior was empowered by section 2 of the Act of May 1, 1890²⁵:

... to designate as an Indian reservation any area of land which has been reserved for the use and occupancy of Indians or Eskimos by section 8 of the Act of May 17, 1884 (23 Stat. 26), or by section 14 of section 15 of the Act of March 3, 1891 (26 Stat. 1103), or which has been heretofore reserved under any executive order and placed under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior or any bureau thereof, together with additional public lands adjacent thereto, within the Territory of Alaska or any other public lands which are actually occupied by Indians or Eskimos within said Territory. Provided, That the designation by the Secretary of the Interior of any such area of land as a reservation shall be effective only upon its approval by the vote, by secret ballot, of a majority of the Indian or Eskimo residents thereof who vote at a special election duly called by the Secretary of the Interior upon thirty days' notice. Provided, however, That in each instance the total vote cast shall not be less than 80 per centum of those entitled to vote.

A provision is also made that this act shall not affect existing rights.

There have already been a number of administrative interpretations of this act. It has been held that a reservation may include sufficient water frontage to protect and provide for the fishing occupations of the Indians.²⁶ Although water in connection with the reservation of the uplands cannot be independently reserved under section 2, waters adjacent to any lands already reserved or being reserved may be reserved for the natives occupying the rest of the reservation.²⁷ Waters may be withdrawn extending as far from the shore as the territorial limits of Alaska.

Adopting the test formulated in the Supreme Court in the Utaska Pacific Fisheries case,²⁸ it was held to be the intent of Congress that under section 2 only those adjacent waters may be reserved which are essential for the effective use and are an integral part of the reserved land. A recent opinion²⁹ on this question advised:

It appears that for all practical purposes the extent of water designated by the President in connection with the Attu Islands Reservation, namely, 3,000 feet from the shore at mean low tide, should be used as the standard and even as the maximum unless it is shown that the natives have been using and actually need a further area (19-9-10).

The principal part of each reservation must be land upon which the natives are actually residing.³⁰

SECTION 9. TRIBES AND ASSOCIATIONS

Indian villages have been organized under the Municipal Incorporation Law of Alaska³¹ and the Indian Village Act.³² It is reported that some Indian villages not organized under either of these laws have an informal organization with a council, usually elected annually.³³

Section 39 of the Act of June 18, 1894³⁴ provides that Eskimos and other aboriginal peoples of Alaska shall be considered Indians for the purpose of the act, and section 13 provides that sections 9, 10, 11, 12, and 38 shall apply to the Territory of Alaska. These provisions relate to tribal organization, loans for economic development and for tuition in vocational schools, and preference to Indians for positions in the Indian Service. The Act of May 1, 1890,³⁵ extends to Alaska all the remaining sections except sections 2, 3, 4, and 18, relating to tribal lands and reservations, which are largely inapplicable to this territory. This act offered a new source of federal protection to the natives "who in the past," according to Commissioner of Indian Affairs Collier, "have seen their land rights almost universally disregarded, their fishing rights increasingly invaded, and their economic situation grow each year more desperate."³⁶

The Act of May 1, 1890, was passed to remedy the failure of the Act of June 18, 1894 to extend the incorporation and credit privileges of that act to the organizations in Alaska, and, what was equally important, to authorize a type of organization more suited to the existing native groupings and activities than the organizations authorized for Indians in the States.

By an oversight, apparently, of the congressional conference committee considering the Act of June 18, 1894, section 17 of that act providing for incorporation of tribes, was omitted from the list of sections made applicable to Alaska, and this resulted in the ruling that the credit funds made available by section 10 to incorporated organizations could not be made available in Alaska in the absence of the privilege of incorporation.³⁷ The omission was remedied in the Act of 1890 by the express extension of section 17 to Alaska organizations and by the provision that the groups of Indians authorized to organize may receive charters of incorporation and credit loans in accordance with the Act of June 18, 1894.²⁰⁰

The type of organization authorized by the latter act was the organization of Indian bands or tribes, or the Indians residing on a reservation. However, since most of the natives in Alaska do not live on reservations and are not grouped as bands or tribes, as in the States,²⁰¹ and since most of the natives live in native villages or communities and many groups of natives work in particular kinds of occupations or have other ties that bind their interests together, it was provided in section 1 of the Act of May 1, 1898, that groups of Indians in Alaska not heretofore recognized as bands or tribes, but having a common bond of occupation, or association, or residence within a well-defined neighborhood, community, or rural district, may organize to adopt constitutions and bylaws and to receive charters of incorporation and Federal loans under sections 16, 17, and 10 of the Act of June 18, 1894 (48 Stat. 884)

The criterion of organization was adopted from section 9 of the Federal Credit Union Act,²⁰² and the interpretation of this language by the authorities administering that act is looked to for guidance in determining the eligibility of native groups seeking to organize.

Under the interpretation and application of the Act of May 1, 1898, the Interior Department has held, as a matter of law and policy, that, like a band or tribe, a group which may organize under the act must be a previously existing group, bound by common interests or economic ties, and not a newly formed group established solely for the purpose of receiving benefits under the Indian Reorganization Act. The Interior Department has also held that, as in the organization of a band or tribe, the group may organize itself as a unit and include in the outset all those natives who belong to the group, although individuals may withdraw later from the organization.

The instructions on organization in Alaska, approved by the Secretary of the Interior on December 22, 1897, set forth the kinds of organization possible under the act:

(1) A group consisting of all the native residents of a locality may organize to carry on municipal and public activities as well as economic enterprises. This type of organization would be suitable for exclusively native villages. Authority for municipal activities is based on the provision of section 17 of the

The native villages vary "from 30 or 10 to 300 or 400 persons. Except in southeastern Alaska, these villages are widely separated and have little or no communication with each other. The village and not the ethnological tribe is the unit." Letter by R. L. Walrus, in Hearings before the Senate Committee on Indian Affairs on March 28, 1933, on S. 1100, 72nd Cong., 1st sess., p. 10.

* * * It was established that the villages in Alaska were the natural form of Indian organization and that no tribal organization existed as they are known in the United States. It was found that the word "tribe" was used in Alaska to denote ethnic or language groups and did not signify "domestic dependent nations" as the tribes were recognized to be in the United States (Memo. Rel. 1, 11, and 12, 1940).

* * * While the native organizations and associations in Alaska do not have the character or status of tribes, they may equally be considered instrumentalities of the United States where they are operating under a loan agreement from the United States or are organized and chartered as Federal corporations under the Indian Reorganization Act (Memo. Rel. 1, 11, June 10, 1940).

Act of June 18, 1894, providing that the constitutions may contain all powers of an Indian group recognized under existing law. The best example of this type of organization is the organization of the Eskimo villages.²⁰³

(2) Groups comprising all the native residents of a locality may organize solely for business purposes without contemplating municipal activities. This type of organization is especially suitable in the case of Indian groups residing at white communities, which communities already provide for municipal activities. Examples of such an organization are the organizations at Craig²⁰⁴ and Sitka.²⁰⁵

(3) A group not comprising all the residents of a locality but comprising persons having a common bond of occupation or association may organize to carry on economic activities. In the case of such organizations, cooperative and democratic features in the method of organization are encouraged and no wide a line among the natives is sought as is possible in the circumstances of the case. An example of such an organization is the Ildvaburg Cooperative Association, composed of resident Native fishermen of Ildvaburg who have a "common bond of occupation in the fish industry, including the catching, processing and selling of fish and the building of fishing boats and equipment."²⁰⁶

As of February 1, 1941, 88 native groups had organized and received charters under the Alaska act.²⁰⁷

Although the Alaskan Native Brotherhood, is neither a tribe nor a group organized under the Act of May 1, 1898, it must be considered in any survey of native organizations. The Brotherhood was organized in the fall of 1913 with the unannounced objective of preparing the natives of Alaska to exercise the rights and duties of citizenship. The Brotherhood is governed by an annual convention composed of delegates from its "local camps."

Executive officers, including the Grand Secretary, who is the administrative head, are elected annually.⁴⁰

The Grand President becomes a member of a permanent "Executive Committee" which exercises the powers of the convention between sessions.

"This society takes an active interest in legislation and other matters which affect the natives."⁴¹

Unique among native communities is that of the Metlakathla Indians. Encouraged by federal officials, about 800 of these Indians migrated in 1887 to the Annette Islands in southeast Alaska from their homes in Metlakathla, British Columbia.⁴² A ruling of the Attorney General⁴³ held that the President of the United States lacked authority to establish a reservation for these Indians on the public domain without congressional sanction, because they were aliens, born outside of the boundaries of the United States proper. By the Act of March 4, 1887,⁴⁴ Congress created a reservation for the use of these immigrants and such other Alaskan natives, as might join them, to be used in common under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior.⁴⁵ By the Act of March 4, 1907,⁴⁶

Congress permitted these Indians to be licensed as masters, pilots, and engineers of steamboats and as operators of motor boats as if citizens of the United States. Congress granted collective naturalization by the Act of May 7, 1934,⁴⁷ to the Metlakathlans and the Indians who emigrated from British Columbia and later than January 1, 1900 and resided continuously in Annette Island.

The community has flourished; it owns a salmon cannery⁴⁸ which is operated under a lease from the Department of the Interior. Out of their receipts they have built up a large trust fund⁴⁹ in the Treasury of the United States, bearing a percent interest.

The community income is used by the directors at the town council for civic improvements, care of dependents, etc. From the profits, the community has built and equipped a hydro-electric plant which furnishes each house with electricity free of charge.

The privilege of joining the Metlakathla community and occupying any part of the Island is subject to vote of the Metlakathla council. To obtain membership, except by birth, requires the approval of three-fourths of the members of the town council. The land and resources of the reservation are held in common; individuals occupy land by permits from the council. Local self government is recognized in rules and regulations of the Secretary of the Interior.⁵⁰

At the outset a number of "local camps" and many efforts had vigorously opposed the provisions of the Wheeler-Howard Act offering to "Indian reservations" because they thought that these provisions would deprive them of some of their rights of citizenship. When it was demonstrated that this fear was groundless, the Executive Committee approved the measure. Ibid. 180.

There are more Indians in the State of New York than there are in Wyoming, Colorado, and Utah combined.¹ Because of the persistence of traditional forms of tribal organization,² and because of treaty arrangements with New York which preceded the Federal Constitution and special dealings with the state since that time, the various New York tribes have a peculiar status, which has been the subject of a series of cases, federal³ and state,⁴ and at least two excellent legal studies.⁵ While the complexity of the subject, and limitations of space and time preclude an extensive analysis of the status of the New York tribes, in this work, two aspects of the subject may be briefly treated: the history of federal and state relations, and the present status of these tribes with respect to local government.

SECTION 1. HISTORICAL BACKGROUND⁶

The Iroquois Indian Confederacy, sometimes called the Five Nations or the Six Nations, consisted of the Seneca, Cayuga, Onondaga, Oneida and Mohawk tribes of Indians and, during the latter period of its existence, the Tuscarora tribe. They occupied all of what is now northern and western New York, and their league is acknowledged by historians as being the triumph of

is taken, almost in its entirety, from the brief in the case of United States v. Christie, 23 F. Supp. 846 (D. C. W. D. N. Y. 1938), filed by the Indian legislation. Not only did the Iroquois outstrip all other Indians both of Mexico in their political institutions, but they were likewise the most powerful. Their territory at one time extended from the hills of New England to the Mississippi River and from upper Canada into North Carolina. Other tribes occupying this expanse were either annihilated, expelled, subjugated, aligned with, or absorbed by the Iroquois. The Iroquois' possession of the strategic water routes (the natural gateway to the interior) along with their power and control over the important western fur trade, gave to these Indians a position in history which has profoundly influenced the present day status of all American Indians.

The controlling object and interest of the Dutch who settled New York, was to trade with the Indians. Their meager needs for land did not affect the Iroquois who were situated to the north and west of Albany (Fort Orange) and in their desire for trade they took particular pains to cultivate the friendship of the Department of Justice on behalf of the United States. The statements therein contained are corroborated by statements found in New York Indians: United States, 1701 to 1812.

An interesting account of the tribes inhabiting western New York during the early colonial period, some of whom no longer reside in the State is contained in a memorandum of John B. T. Reeves, Chief Counsel Office of Indian Affairs, who appears in H. Doc. No. 1590 add. Com. ed. sec. (1915), and reads as follows:

With colonists in what is now western New York found the country more or less densely populated by aborigines of various tribes, principally the Senecas, Cayugas, Oneidas, Onondagas, and Mohawks. The Senecas, Cayugas, and Onondagas were the most numerous, known among themselves as Iro-quois as we are, but generally designated by the name Sagoyew by the whites. The Senecas during the early days. In the Iroquois confederacy the Onondagas, as the founders of the league, kept the central fire, the Mohawks guarded the doors in war, and the Cayugas the doors in peace. The Cayugas were stationed between the central fire and the east, while the Senecas were stationed between the central fire and the west.

About 1710 the Senecas, then living in North Carolina, became involved in quarrels with white settlers and adjoining Indian tribes, these Indians were severely defeated in battle they migrated to New York and were finally united with the five tribes just mentioned, thus making the Six Nations of New York, by which name the Indians are now most commonly known. At the period of its greatest strength—the latter part of the seventeenth century—the Iroquois League numbered 15,000 souls, and even to this day the union still continues to some extent, although its component membership as to tribes has unusually changed.

With the exception of the Onondagas and a part of the Senecas, these Indians sided with the mother country in the Revolution and were left unprotected and unprotected in the treaty of peace between Great Britain and the confederated Colonies. Naturally, considered among them at the close of the Revolution, due to the fact that in the main they had sided with the losing party in the great struggle, the Mohawks migrated to Canada and settled on lands provided for them by the British Government, while a remnant of this tribe still lives. By treaty the Mohawks (and the State where they lived) they had no land in New York, and subsequently the Six Nations Indians were formally adopted by the Six Nations in place of the Mohawks.

The Cayugas also sold their land to the State and gradually migrated westward locating first in the Ohio Valley and finally removing to the Indian Territory and became assimilated with other tribes there. A few Cayugas still remain in New York, residing principally with the Senecas and Onondagas. We later on mention of the Seneca tribe—being frequently designated "The Tonawanda Band of Seneca Indians." The State paid the Cayugas at the rate of 4 shillings per acre and thereafter sold the land for 10 shillings per acre. About 1883 representative of the tribe began to petition the State for the difference in price between the one paid to them and that received by the State. Finally, in 1890, the legislature of the State passed an act to compensate and adjust and settle the claim of the Cayuga Indians against the State for a sum not exceeding $27,131.50, with an additional allowance of $27,131.50 in case the claim should be found to be correct.

The Onondagas also, by various means, sold all of their land, except about 150 acres of the State, and removed to the reservation in Wisconsin procured from the Menominee by treaty with the Federal Government. The 150 acres, in New York belongs to the Onondagas but some have been divided in severalty under State laws, as a tribe these Indians are known no more in that State. Six Cayugas remain in New York and are regarded as of no importance at this time, via the Senecas, Tonawandas, Cayugas, Onondagas, St. Regis, and Shushewab, the latter, however, never having secured a unit in the Six Nations although at one time they did give tribute to the Mohawks. Iroquois and accordingly afforded them the status of independent nations which they demanded.

When the English took over the Dutch colony in 1664, they were careful to continue a trade which was to make Albany the fur capital of North America during the latter part of the seventeenth and the early part of the eighteenth centuries.

A RESISTANCE BY IROQUOIS TO FRENCH

The French fully appreciated the importance of the Iroquois. The Iroquois and Dutch (later the English) possession of New York made necessary for the French a chain of forts some 2,000 miles in length, and it was ever the purpose of the French to reduce the length of this to about 300 miles by taking possession of New York.

Division of fur trade to the English was effected by the Iroquois from as far as what is now Illinois and Wisconsin, and this along with the Iroquois occupation of northern and western New York was an obstacle to the trade and territorial interests and ambitions of France.

The official French attitude toward these Indians might well be considered as summed up in a letter written by Du Châtelier in 1681:

There is no doubt, and it is the universal opinion, that if the Iroquois are allowed to proceed they will subdue the Illinois, and in a short time render themselves masters of all the Ottawa tribes, and divert the trade to the English, so that it is absolutely necessary to make them out friends at this juncture.

Failing to cultivate a friendship which was detrimental to the Iroquois' independence and trading interests, the French spent about a hundred years in trying to destroy the Iroquois. In this they failed.

The Iroquois resisted every attempt upon their territory, and independence with unparalleled tenacity and with very little or no aid from their allies, the English, until quite late in the struggle, when the English, at the request of the Iroquois, established one or two under-manured forts in their territory.

New York was cognizant of the importance of the Iroquois, both from the standpoint of trade and colonial defense.

The friendship of these Indians was a highly important, if not a decisive, factor in the struggle of France and England for this Continent. The history of this struggle, as enacted in America, is largely the history of these Indians, who in defending their own lands, played an international role which brought them recognition in treaties between France and England. It is no wonder that the Iroquois were "courted and conciliated" by England and that their national character was scrupulously observed and recognized.

"The house at Oswego being of highest importance to the front, ought by all means to be preserved from falling into the hands of the French. If you suffer Oswego to fall into the hands of the French I must fear you will lose the Six Nations, an event which will expose the whole country to the merciless and unrelenting cruelty of a savage enemy. . . . wherefore at any expense Oswego ought to be maintained that the delivery of the Six Nations may be preserved." *This is illustrated by the following excerpt from a memorandum of the Lands Division of the Department of Justice:

In 1768, acting under a Commission of the British Crown, Sir William Johnson entered into a treaty with the Six Nations by the terms of which the boundaries of the Iroquois Confederacy were defined and located, and the territory of these Nations was mutually set apart from the lands of the Colony of New York. By this treaty the Indians sold and granted to the King's full and entire Title of Land situate in North America at the Back of the

B. AFFAIRS OF IROQUOIS AS AFFECTING ALL COLONIES

With their territory, dominance, and influence extending into many of the colonies, interference with these Indians inevitably affected the interests of the colonies as well as the Crown.

"The international aspect of the Iroquois resulting from the extent of their territory and influence, made relations with them of serious concern to all of the northern and central colonies, and more than one treaty with these Indians was negotiated by several of the colonies acting together. Such was the Treaty of 1745 between the Iroquois and New York, Massachusetts, Connecticut, and Pennsylvania. Franklin's famous Plan of Union of the colonies was proposed at one of the joint conferences, held in June 1754 at Albany, by the States of New York, Massachusetts, Connecticut, Pennsylvania, New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and Maryland "for the purpose of treating with the Six Nations and conceiving a scheme of general union of the British American Colonies."¹⁰

Another action favouring control by the central authority of the Crown was the conflict of land settlements and trade. More than one self-seeking colony would act in such a manner (or sanction the actions of its settlers or traders) as to encroach the entire frontier in an Indian war—the consequences of which often would be borne by all of the colonies.

C. SHIFT OF CONTROL OF IROQUOIS AFFAIRS FROM ALBANY TO COLONY TO CROWN

Relations with the Iroquois were in the beginning for the most part a matter of trade and nominally conducted in the name of the King of England. In fact, the actual management of affairs with the Iroquois was with the city of Albany. The charter of this city of 1690 gave to Albany the

Male & only Monarch of the Trade with the Indians as well within this whole County as without the same to the Eastward Northward and Westward thereof as far as his Majesty's Dominion here does or may extend.¹¹

Though Albany was the principal of North America during colonial days, the regulation of affairs with these Indians was not a municipal matter as is readily seen from the foregoing, and accordingly the colony assumed an ever increasing control until the charter was finally revoked. But regulation of the relations with the Iroquois was no more a colonial matter than it was a municipal proposition and therefore the Crown of England abandoned its nominal control in favor of an active and actual supervision.

D. NATIONAL AND INTERNATIONAL ASPECT OF IROQUOIS AS AFFECTING FEDERAL CONSTITUTION

1 Iroquois in Revolutionary War—At the beginning of the Revolutionary War the Confederate Government took immediate steps to secure the neutrality of the Iroquois, and though the League remained neutral, the several tribes took sides, some with the colonies, some with their traditional ally, the Crown, and some fought on both sides.¹² The Senecas participated throughout the war with England.

Sullivan's campaign against the hostile tribes of the Iroquois was one of the major military operations of the Revolutionary War against Indians. The long years of incessant warfare with the French and the havoc wrought by Sullivan's expedition had broken the power of the Iroquois, and they were left by England at the end of the war to make their separate peace with the newly created Union.

2 Importance to union of peace negotiations with Iroquois—The treaty of peace between the United States and the Iroquois was considered of considerable importance to the Central Government. Washington, in 1783, made a personal trip to the lands of the Iroquois to humiliate himself with conditions. The negotiations of peace in 1784 were closely followed by Washington in Virginia and Jefferson in Paris, and such personalities as James Madison, James Monroe, Lafayette, and General Butler were present as negotiators in observance.

The Iroquois insisted on acting in their collective capacity and, though they had been harried by Sullivan's expedition, any effort to expel the hostile tribes of the Iroquois from their ancient lands or any attempt to break up the League into its several tribes, would have been attended in a prolonged frontier war which the new Union was not prepared to prosecute.

The controlling purpose of the Central Government was to make peace with the Iroquois and to drive a wedge between them and the western tribes—to separate the Iroquois from the subjugated western tribes and to undermine the influence of the League over them.

New York on the other hand was more than anxious to rid the state of the hostile Senecas, Cayugas, Onondagas, and Mohawks and to move the friendly Oneidas and Tuscaroras to a small part of the lands of the Senecas in western New York. She considered herself as supreme (under the Articles of Confederation) in dealing with the New York Indians and intended to separate the different tribes of the Iroquois. In her futile attempt to carry out these purposes she stopped at nothing, even arresting agents of the Confederate Government who were trying to negotiate the treaty of peace.¹³

Had New York's attempts in obstructing the peace treaty prevailed over the efforts of the Central Government in this respect, New York would have probably consolidated the Iroquois instead of dividing them, and this might well have resulted in a united League serving as the agent head of a cruel, prolonged, and costly Indian war of all of the western Indians (more than 35 tribes) under the influence and leadership of the Iroquois.

Though under the Articles of Confederation there was a question of whether the Confederate Government was invading the rights of the State of New York relative to the Iroquois, the necessity of the times and the importance of these Indians in relation to all of the states made it imperative that the Central Government take definite action.

¹¹ Richard Henry Lee, later President of the Continental Congress, in writing to George Washington concerning the efforts of New York to obstruct the treaty, said:

"* * * I understand, from Mr. Wolcott, that the commissioners of the United States met many difficulties, driven as they were by New York, which they overcame, at last, by much firmness and perseverance. It is unfortunate when private views obstruct public measures, and more especially when a state becomes opposed to the States, because, it seems to confirm the predictions of those who wish us well, and who are well disposed from a discord arising from different interests." (Bellaugh, James Curtis, The Letters of Richard Henry Lee (1811), vol. 2, p. 208.)

British Settlement, bounded by a line which we have now agreed upon and do hereby establish as the Boundary between us and the British colonies in America." The ensuing treaty was in effect three treaties: (a) A treaty of peace and general amnesty between the Iroquois and the United States with provisions for prisoners of war and a relinquishment of their claim to roughly all lands west and south of what is now New York; (b) a treaty with Pennsylvania relinquishing all lands in that state; and (c) a treaty between New York and the Oneidas and Tuscaroras, relinquishing certain of their lands.

In the drafting of the Federal Constitution Madison, who had attended the Treaty of 1784 and realized the importance of placing the management of affairs of the Iroquois Indians in the hands of the proposed United States Government, introduced a resolution on August 18, 1787, intending to give Congress the power:

To regulate affairs with the Indians, as well within as without the limits of the United States.¹

The principles of this resolution are embodied in the Constitution of the United States.

E EFFECT OF TREATIES OF 1789 AND 1794

The United States entered into the treaties of 1789² and 1794³ with the Iroquois (Six Nations) Indians recognizing the Indians as distinct and separate political communities capable of managing their internal affairs as they had always done. These treaties were entered into for the purpose of meeting a serious situation confronting the United States. Great Britain still retained possession of certain forts in New York and the Northwest Territory in violation of the treaty of peace, and was apparently encouraging and provoking the western Indians and the Iroquois to hostilities against the United States—even providing them with arms with which to resist encroachments upon their lands.

The settlement of the Northwest Territory brought the usual friction between the Indians and the settlers which broke out into frontier wars. The Iroquois felt a responsibility toward these western tribes since they believed that part of the difficulties of these tribes, which were now dependent on the Iroquois, was due to the sale by the Iroquois of all of their western lands. The problem confronting the Federal Government was to make peace with the Iroquois, and particularly the Senecas, before the almost inevitable strife began and thus prevent the Iroquois from acting as a spear head in a united general offensive by the scores of western Indian tribes (once subjects of the Iroquois) under their leadership and directing influence.

The Treaty of 1789⁴ granted to the Iroquois a substantial amnesty and they in turn agreed to continue at peace. Thereafter certain of the influential Seneca chiefs were induced to go to the West on behalf of the peace efforts of the United States. These western Indian wars, nevertheless, created a decided mistrust, particularly among the Senecas and the United States prudently entered into a third treaty with the Iroquois (Six Nations) in 1794⁵ of mutual peace, and restoring certain of the Seneca's lands to them within the State of New York west of a line drawn due south from Buffalo to the Pennsylvania line.

These several treaties⁶ guaranteed to the Iroquois (Six Nations) the right of occupancy of their well defined territories and had the effect of placing the tribes and their reservations beyond the operation and effect of general state laws.

F FEDERAL MANAGEMENT OF NEW YORK INDIAN AFFAIRS

1. Education and civilization—Some of the first efforts and experiments of the United States Government in educating Indians were with the New York Indians. For a number of years the only effort to educate these Indians was by the aid rendered by the Federal Government and private philanthropy. By about 1890, the State had been making slight efforts to educate the Indians in the State but such efforts were admitted by the State to have done probably as much harm as good.

Aside from the sporadic aid the State gave to the Indians mainly in the way of education, the State left the Indians to manage their own internal affairs as they saw fit, as had been implicitly guaranteed by federal treaty. Such activities merely confer a privilege on the Indians and are not an attempt to regulate their internal affairs or tribal matters.

2. Restrictions on alienation of lands—Pursuant to the specific delegation of authority by the Constitution to regulate Indian commerce, Congress immediately imposed restrictions upon the alienation of Indian lands. Where the States claimed the fee title subject to Indian occupancy as claimed by Georgia, or the "quærention right" as claimed by New York, all purchases were prohibited except in treaties under supervision of the United States.

Many, but not all, purchases from the Seneca Nation of Indians (with the exception of one very small tract of a few acres), whether by the State of New York or its grantee of the "quærention right," were made by treaties under the supervision of United States agents appointed for that purpose pursuant to the restrictive act of Congress. Approximately four million acres of land from time to time were thus purchased from the Seneca Indians under federal authority.⁴

3 Removal to the West—Treaties of 1818 and 1842—In 1817, and perhaps before, Governor Tompkins of New York was arguing for the removal of the New York Indians by the United States to the West.⁵ The question of removal was obviously a function which could be executed only by the Federal Government. Whether the Indians were to be removed at all, and if so, where to, could only be determined by the Federal Government.

On February 12, 1816, the Secretary of War, by authority of the President, gave the New York Indians permission to negotiate with the western tribes, at their own expense, for the purchase of lands. In 1819 and 1821, the Government aided some 10 Indians representing certain New York Indian tribes, in exploring Wisconsin with a view of selecting lands and making arrangements with the Indians residing there for a portion of their country.⁶

On August 18, 1821, the Menomonee Indians ceded to the Stockbridge, Oneida, Tuscarora, St. Regis, and Muncie Nations lands in Wisconsin for a consideration paid by these tribes. All but the last named of these tribes were New York Indians. The settlement of members of these tribes on the lands was one of the first removals in the Federal Government's policy of removal of Indian tribes to the West. The ancient right of the New York Indians in these western lands was in dispute. On February 8, 1811, the United States, to settle conflicting claims, negotiated a treaty with the Menomonee⁷ and Winnebago⁸ for the benefit of the New York Indians. The lands in which they were previously entitled to share with the other tribes, were reduced to exclusive possession and two parcels: one of 500,000 acres, and one of 89,120 acres, were purchased for a consideration of $20,000 paid by the United States, and set aside for the New York Indians.

These lands were set apart in Wisconsin for the future home of the New York Indians provided they removed thereto within 8 years. However, most of the New York Indians failing to migrate had already moved to the West.

In the meantime, Wisconsin was being settled by whites and the Indian reserve was needed for expansion. Accordingly, a treaty was negotiated with the New York Indians to exchange these lands in Wisconsin for lands in Kansas and by treaty of January 15, 1838,⁹ this exchange was made. Those of the New York Indians who had already migrated to Wisconsin were secured in the possession of their lands. The first allotment of lands in severity in the United States was to these Indians, an action which anticipated by almost 40 years the general policy of the Federal Government as embodied in the general allotment act of 1887.¹⁰ son. In addition, Congress was to appropriate the sum of $400,000 for the use of the Indians in emigrating from New York to Kansas and in establishing themselves after arriving in Kansas.

The treaty negotiated by the Federal Government with the New York Indians made an exchange of 1,824,000 acres of land in fee simple in Kansas for 487,000 acres at Green Bay, Wisconsin.

All of the New York tribes of Indians assented to this treaty. However, the St. Regis Indians, with their reservation lying in New York and Canada, entered into a supplemental article to the effect that they would not be compelled to remove unless they chose to do so.¹¹ No difficulties were encountered in the negotiation of the treaty except with the Seneca Indians. With these Indians, there was also a deed to the Ogden Land Co., so called (grantee of New York's preemption right), of all of the Seneca's lands, consisting of the valuable Buffalo Creek Reservation of 40,000 acres, some of which land comprises the site of the city of Buffalo, as well as the Tonawanda Reservation of 12,800 as it existed at that time, and the Cattaraugus (21,050 acres) and Allegany (30,100 acres) as they now exist.

This deed to the Ogden Land Co., so called, was denounced by the Indians on the ground that it had not been signed by a majority of the chiefs of the Seneca Nation, and that bribes, liquor, and fraud had been used and practiced by the Ogden Land Co. in securing many of the signatures of the chiefs to the deed. The treaty was nevertheless recognized as binding by the Federal Government.

The Seneca Nation refused to move to the West or leave its reservations and the Federal Government was not inclined to repent in respect to the New York Indians any such forced removal as was experienced by the southern Indians a decade before. The Ogden Land Co. accordingly negotiated the compromise Treaty of May 20, 1842,¹² whereby the company released to the Senecas the Allegany and Cattaraugus Reservations and the Senecas released the Buffalo Creek and Tonawanda Reservations. The original consideration was proportionately reduced. The value of the improvements of the individual Indians was to be determined by appraisers appointed by the Secretary of War and the Ogden Land Co.

The Senecas on the Buffalo Creek Reservation gradually withdrew to the Cattaraugus and Allegany Reservations.

In 1848, the United States appointed a special agent for the removal of such of the New York Indians as desired to move to their western lands. He enrolled 271 Indians, of whom 78 did not leave New York with the party. He arrived in Kansas on June 15, 1848, with 191 and 17 arrived later. Of this number, 17 returned to New York. Only 32 received patents or certificates of allotment in accordance with the terms of the treaty, and of those, none settled permanently in Kansas.¹³ A council was called by the Indian Commissioner June 2, 1848, to determine the final disposition of the Indians on emigration. Only 7 persons requested to be enrolled.¹⁴

4 State encroachment on ceded reservations—The Legislature of the State of New York, expecting the Indians to remove from the ceded reservations, in 1840 and 1841, enacted laws for the assessment and collection of taxes and for the surveying of the lands, laying out roads and the construction of bridges on the ceded reservations. The Act of May 6, 1840, was declared void by the state courts on the theory that the state could not tax the lands of the Indians, and the Supreme Court of the United States, in The New York Indians,¹⁵ in considering the "saving clause" of the Act of May 4, 1841, said:

* * * "But no sale for the purpose of collecting said taxes shall in any manner affect the right of the Indians to occupy and land." It is true that this clause underlines to save this right, which the act of 1819 did not, but the rights of the Indians do and depend on this or any other Statutes of the State but upon treaties, which are the supreme law of the land, it is in these treaties we must look to ascertain the nature of these rights, and the extent of them. (P. 705.)

5 Federal recognition of Seneca constitution—In 1848 a convention of the Seneca Nation was called which promulgated a complete constitution, which provided for the abolition of the chiefs, the establishment of an elective council and courts, and in general altered and modified the entire tribal form of government, though not abolishing it.

There was some question of whether this constitution represented the wishes of the majority of the Indians, and the United States investigated the matter and decided to recognize the new form of government as it might apply to the Indians on the Allegany and Cattaraugus Reservations. William Medill, Commissioner of Indian Affairs, by letter of February 2, 1849, directed the United States Indian agent for New York as follows:

The new form of Government of the Indians on the Cattaraugus and Allegany Reservation having been adopted by a majority, will be recognized by the Government, and so far as may be necessary, the relations of the Government with those Indians will be made to conform thereto.

6 Separation from Seneca Nation of Tonawanda band—As to the Tonawanda Reservation, the compromise Treaty of 1842⁴ did not assist the Ogden Land Co. in gaining possession. The Indians on that reservation protested that they had not been a party to the treaty of either 1838⁵ or 1842 and refused to move. In fact none of the chiefs of this band of the Seneca Nation had signed either treaty and the other bands of the Seneca Nation (Cattaraugus, Allegany, and Buffalo Creek), by "selling out" the Tonawanda Reservation, had caused the latter band to split off from the Seneca Nation, an action which was recognized by the Federal Government when the Seneca Nation (Allegany and Cattaraugus) adopted their constitution.

The appraisers appointed by the Government and the Ogden Land Co. had attempted to appraise the lands and improvements of the Tonawanda Reservation pursuant to the treaty stipulations.

It had been prevented from so doing by the Indians in possession, and had been removed and left off the land, the Indians not even delaying to procure legal process.

The Ogden Land Co., however, paid into the United States Treasury the whole amount awarded by the arbitrators, and "by force attempted to eject some of the Indians from possession." The Indians brought the matter into the courts by the action of Blacksmith v. Fellows,⁶ which reached the United States Supreme Court in 1856 as Fellows v. Blacksmith.⁷ The Supreme Court decided that even though the Indians had sold their lands they were to be considered as on the land under their original right of possession and entitled to the protection of treaties and that they could be removed only by the United States Government.

The formal recognition by the United States of the Tonawanda tribe of Indians, by the Treaty of 1877,⁸ as a separate and distinct tribe of Indians, and independent of the Seneca Nation on the Allegany and Cattaraugus Reservations, is significant in view of the history of the hands of the Seneca Indians. The Tonawandas were satisfied with their chiefs who had refused to participate in the sale of their lands, and this tribe has continued to regulate its internal affairs under its original tribal form of government and has continued to enforce its ancient laws, usages, and customs as modified by practice.

7 Indian leases—Prior to 1875, the village of Salamanca on the Allegany Reservation grew up through numerous alleged leases of Indian lands, ostensibly under state laws and authority, but contrary to federal laws. A careful consideration of the validity of these leases under state authority led state courts to the conclusion that such leases were void as being in violation of federal restrictions on Indian lands against leasing or alienation. To place these illegal leases on a legal basis, the state legislature passed a concurrent resolution as follows:

Whereas, The Legislature of the State of New York has, at different times, ratified and confirmed leases between Indian and white settlers on the Allegany Indian reservation in said State, and

Whereas, The courts of this State have decided that said ratification is null and void, the Congress of the United States alone possessing power to deal with and for the Indians, and, now therefore,

Resolved (if the Senate concur), that our Senators and Representatives in Congress be requested to lay the matter before Congress, at an early day, and procure the passage of a law, or take some action in the relief of said white settlers.

Resolved (if the Senate concur), That a copy of this resolution be furnished to each of the members of the Senate and Congress from this State.⁹

Congress legitimized part of these leases for 5 years and provided for the establishment of certain villages on the Cattaraugus and Allegany Indian Reservations, and further provided for new and renewal leases.¹⁰ Provision was also made for the extension of the highway laws of the State of New York over the Allegany and Cattaraugus Reservations of the Seneca Nation "with the consent of said Seneca Nation in council." By this act, as amended by Act of September 30, 1890,¹¹ and Act of February 28, 1901,¹² the Federal Government has legitimized leases on the Allegany and Cattaraugus Indian Reservations and continues to do so.

SECTION 2. THE PRESENT STATUS OF TRIBAL GOVERNMENT⁴⁵

The Indian reservations now occupied by the New York Indians are the Allegany, Cattaraugus, Oil Springs, Conplanter,⁴⁶ Tonawanda, St. Regis, Tuscarora, Onondaga,⁴⁷ Shinnecock, ⁴⁵ Material in this section is based, except where otherwise noted, on a report of Paul Gordon on New York Indians (Indian Office Files, 10085).

⁴⁶ The Conplanter Reservation is actually in Pennsylvania, but residents are recognized by Seneca of the Allegany and Cattaraugus Reservations.

and Poosapatuck. All save the Shinnecock and Poosapatuck, which are on Long Island, are inhabited by descendants of the famous Iroquois League of Six Nations (originally Five Nations), the sixth, the Tuscarora, joining the League in 1722. The Tuscarora and Onondaga Reservations are held by the Tuscarora and Onondaga Nations. The St. Regis Reservation vation is held by the St. Regis Mohawks, the Tonawanda by the Tonawanda Band of Senecas, and the Allegany, Cattaraugus, and Oil Springs Reservations by "The Seneca Nation of Indians," a corporate body under the laws of New York. The Comptroller Reservation of Pennsylvania is held by the descendants of Cornplanter, who unite with the Seneca Nation in affairs affecting that nation.¹⁰ The Indians of this reservation are grouped with those of the Allegany Reservation for purposes of local government and voting.

A SENECA NATION

The government of the Seneca Indians is covered by Articles 4 and 5 of the New York Indian Code.¹¹ The constitution now in force among these Indians provides for three departments of government: executive, legislative, and judiciary. The legislative power is vested in a council of 10 members elected biannually, 5 from the Cattaraugus Reservation and 5 from the Allegany Reservation.¹²

The executive power is vested in a president who presides, fills vacancies, and has a casting vote.¹³

The judiciary power is vested in peacekeepers' and surrogate's courts. The peacekeepers' courts are composed of three members each from the respective reservations.¹⁴ Peacekeepers' courts are given powers to enforce the attendance of witnesses in the same manner as provided for courts of justices, of the peace of the state.¹⁵ Peacekeepers have, by statute, jurisdiction

¹¹ McKinney's Cons. Laws of New York Annotated, Bk. 25, New York Indian Code.

¹⁴ The Oil Spring Reservation, located partly in Allegany and partly in Cattaraugus Counties, contains only 640 acres. Its name is derived from a muddy pool, about 20 feet in diameter, located near the center of the tract, from which the Indians formerly obtained a sort of crude petroleum locally known as "Seneca oil," and which was used quite extensively by them in earlier days for medicinal purposes. The Seneca fully understood that this tract was reserved to them in the sale to Robert Morris at Big Tree, but title thereto does not appear from an examination of the treaty itself. At any rate, this reserve was included in a sale by Robert Morris to the United Land Co., so-called, and several adverse conveyances transferred title by deed dated February 28, 1850, one Philomena Pattison became the ostensible owner of a part thereof. On taking possession, the Seneca Indians began an action in ejectment against Pattison. A verdict in favor of the Indians was rendered by the lower court, but the case was appealed to the supreme court of the State and finally to the court of appeals, both of which affirmed the decision of the trial court, and the Indians have since remained in undisturbed possession. A written opinion of the case does not appear to have been handed down, but the pleadings, transcripts of evidence, judgment, and decree of the court are still on file in Little Valley the county seat of Cattaraugus County. (If Dec. No 1860, 63d Cong., 2d sess., 1915, pp. 11-12.)

¹⁷ New York Indian Code, supra, sec. 41.

¹⁸ Ibid., sec. 46. Although the New York Indian Code expressly provides for similarity in proceedings only insofar as compelling attendance to grant divorces between Indians residing on the reservations and to determine all questions between individual Indians involving title or possession of lands.¹⁷ Appeal may be taken to the council.¹⁸

The surrogate court is composed of one person from the Allegany and one from the Cattaraugus Reservation, elected by voters of each reservation for a term of 2 years. The procedure is the same as in the surrogate court of the state, and appeal may be taken to the council.¹⁹

Trials taking is declared to be a prerogative of the council, subject to approval by three-fourths of the legal voters and consent of three-fourths of the members of the reservation.²⁰ The constitution provides for a clerk and a treasurer,²¹ and permits the council to provide for highway commissioners, overseers of the poor, assessors and policemen.²² Officers may be removed for cause.²³

Male Indians of 21 or over who shall not have been convicted of a felony are eligible to vote and hold office.²⁴

As witnesses is concerned, the 1893 constitution provides for such liability also in jurisdiction and proceedings. (Sec. 4.)

"On the power of the peacekeepers' courts of the Seneca Indians of the Cattaraugus Reservation, see Washington v. Parker, 7 F. Supp. 120 (D. C. W. D. N. Y. 1934).

The federal courts lack jurisdiction over national questions relating to property rights of individual Indians of the Cattaraugus Reservation, United States v. Seneca Nation, 274 Fed. 645 (1 C. W. D. N. Y., 1921), see v. Mayher, 2 F. Supp. 699 (D. C. W. D. N. Y., 1935).

The court in Rees v. Mosher, 2 F. Supp. 690 (D. C. W. D. N. Y., 1933), described the Seneca government as follows:

In 1849 the Seneca Indians adopted a so-called "Constitutional Charter," abolishing the ancient form of government by chiefs, and setting up a new form of government composed of legislative, executive, and judiciary departments. In the judiciary department it provided for Peacekeepers' courts, in which the jurisdiction was to be the same as in courts of justices of the peace of the state of New York, except in point of venue, and the settlement of blood and personal estates, in which case the Peacekeepers' shall have such power as shall be conferred by law.²⁵ It also provided that "all cases of which the Peacekeepers have no jurisdiction may be heard before the Council, or such courts of the state of New York as the Legislature shall appoint." The council in the lawmaking body. This charter also provided that all laws of the state of New York, not inconsistent with the provisions of the charter, were to continue in full force. This charter was amended in 1868 to provide that these courts have "exclusive jurisdiction in all civil cases arising between Indians residing on said reservation except those of which the Surrogate's Court has jurisdiction." Since the organization of New York state that state has written upon its statute books many laws relative to the management of the affairs of the Indians in these reservations. The Indian charter contemplates a measure of control by the state. The General Indian Law of New York state is included in chapter 26 of the Consolidated Laws, and among its many provisions with reference to the Seneca Indians we find it thus provided for a Peacekeepers' Court, with "authority to hear and determine all matters, disputes and controversies between any Indians residing upon such reservation, whether arising upon contracts or on wrongs, and particularly for any encroachments or trespass on any land cultivated or secured by any one of them, and which shall have been entered and described in the clerk's books of records" (section 40), and, further, "Jurisdiction . . . to hear and determine all questions and actions between individual Indians, residing thereon involving the title to real estate on such reservations." It is clear that the provisions of the Indian charter and this section of the Indian law include actions such as the one here being the action brought before the Peacekeepers' Court. Section 66 of the Indian Law, New York, provides for an appeal from the decision of the Peacekeepers' Court to the council, which was the lawmaking body in the Indian reservation. Here we have both the tribal law and the state law purporting to confer jurisdiction.

The Peacekeepers' Court did not originate with the state. It was the creation of the Indians themselves. As the court in Malina v. Seneca, supra, said, "It is an Indian court which has been recognized and given strength and authority by statute. It does not have the same force as a state court." Malina v. Seneca, 245 N. Y. 187 (N. Y. 1924), 171.

"The council is given power to make laws not inconsistent with the Constitution of the United States, the State of New York, or the Seneca Nation."

"The constitution may be altered or amended at any time by a prescribed process."

B TONAWANDA BAND OF SENECA

"The government of the Tonawanda band is separate and distinct from that of the rest of the Seneca Nation."

"The legislative branch of the government of this band is placed in a council of the chiefs, who are apparently chosen as in the days of the Confederate League of the Iroquois. The power and jurisdiction of this council is recognized and supported by the Indian code of the New York State law."¹ The council is given power to pass laws not inconsistent with this law and is given jurisdiction over criminal trespasses, lands, and fences."²

"The judiciary appears to be in the hands of three peacekeepers elected annually by Tonawanda Senecas, males over 21 years of age may vote. Peacekeepers fix cases involving land boundaries and differences among Indians, and hear suits for divorce."

Additional officers are a president, clerk, treasurer, and marshal.

C ST. REGIS MOHAWKS³

"The local government of the St. Regis Mohawks⁴ is covered by a separate article of the Indian code of the State of New York."⁵ This permits and supports a local governmental unit of three elected chiefs, and three sachetems, who serve when the chiefs are unable to do so.⁶ One chief and one sachem are elected each year, to serve for a period of 3 years,⁷ by male Indians 21 or over residing on the American side of the international boundary, and entitled to draw yearly annuity money.⁸

"The three chiefs have power to pass by-laws not inconsistent with law, relating to common land, fences and animal trespasses,⁹ have jurisdiction over allotment of lands,¹⁰ then consent is necessary for sales of timber,¹¹ and they may hear differences arising among Indians regarding trespass and titles to land."¹² The only other elective officer provided for is that of clerk.¹³

D TUSCARORA NATION

"The Tuscarora Reservation is governed by chiefs of the Tuscarora Nation,"¹⁴ tacitly recognized by the New York code,¹⁵ who have been given power to allot lands,¹⁶ and control timber sales.¹⁷ The statute does not provide for a peacekeepers' court on the Tuscarora Reservation. The statute provides no mechanism for election of chiefs and they appear to be chosen by ancient methods.

⁹The Tuscarora Reservation lies in Niagara County about 9 miles northeast of Niagara Falls, and contains 6,249 acres. The Tuscarora Indians having been adopted by the Iroquois League as one of the Six Nations by deed dated March 10, 1785, the Seneca Nation granted 1 square mile (640 acres) to the Tuscarora Indians. (Liber 1, folio 60, Land Records of Niagara County.) It is reported that subsequently the Holland Land Co., assignee of Robert Morris, "ratified" this grant, and gave to the Tuscaroras 1,250 acres more, but no record of any paper title to this effect can be found. At any rate, the Tuscaroras occupy and claim these lands, as a part of their present reserve, which is subject to the pre-emptive right of the Ogden Land Co. (7 Stat. 580), although the Indians deny this, basing their claim on a decree of the State court in Buffalo handed down in 1830. This suit resulted from an agreement with the Federal Government, January 15, 1838, under which the Six Nations were to remove west of the Mississippi River, and in anticipation of their removal the chiefs of the Tuscarora Tribe executed a deed to Thomas Landin Ogden and Joseph Fellows, purchasers of the Ogden Land Co., containing a release of the Ogden and Fellows, as owners of the pre-emptive right, the 1,250 acres it related to. The deed was placed in the hands of Herman B. Potter, in view pending the performance of certain conditions precedent to delivery. The expected removal failed to materialize, and in 1840 War B. Chew et al., chiefs of the tribe, instituted suit against Herman B. Potter and Joseph Fellows. (Thomas B. Ogden then being deceased), looking to a revocation and cancellation of the deed. A verdict in favor of the Indians was rendered and the deed canceled by the decree of the court, which incidentally in placing the matter in statu quo, as far as the pre-emptive right of Ogden and Fellows was concerned. The execution of the deed was an admission of the existence of the pre-emptive right, and the contention of the Indians that the decree of the court annulling the deed also effectually extinguished the right of pre-emption in the Ogden people does not appear well founded. The records in the case are still on file in the county clerk's office at Buffalo.

About the year 1800 a delegation of Tuscarora Indians visited the governor of North Carolina and negotiated a sale of their lands in that State for approximately $15,000, which money was deposited with the United States in trust. In 1804 Congress authorized the Secretary of War to purchase with this money additional land for these Indians. With these funds 4,820 acres, lying to the south and east of the 1,250 acres already occupied by them, were purchased for the Tuscarora Indians. Title to these lands was taken by the Secretary of War in trust for the Indians, but subsequently (January 5, 1800) the lands were conveyed directly to the Tuscarora Tribe who now own the fee. (Book "A" p. 5, Niagara County clerk's office.) (11 Doe No. 1890, 44th Ct., 3d Ser., 1912, pp. 13-14.)

⁹Subsequent to an act of the New York Legislature in 1791 authorizing the sale of waste lands in New York, Alexander McComb attempted to purchase all lands between Lake Champlain and the St. Lawrence, proposing to enclose a tract 6 miles square for the St. Regis Indians. His offer was rejected. In 1792, 1793, and 1794, the Seven Nations of Canada, Iroquois, who had sided with the British in the Revolution, waited upon the Governor of New York asserting their rights to a greater area, but without favorable result. In 1795 the New York Legislature authorized the Governor to appoint a Commission to extinguish the Indian titles to lands in the northern part of the state. On May 31, 1798, 7 Stat. 65, a treaty was made before Ogden as Commissioner for the United States by which the St. Regis Indians ceded all lands to the United States except an area 8 miles square at St. Regis, a mile square on the Salmon River, reserving $3,500 and an annuity of $380.

E. ONONDAGA NATION

The governing body of the Onondaga Nation appears to be a council of chiefs chosen and installed according to customs of ancient tradition. This body is recognized by inference by the Indian code of the New York State law.²⁵ It has jurisdiction to lease lands with the consent of the agent,²⁶ and its consent is necessary before timber may be removed.²⁷ It also settles disputes among Indians.

F. CAYUGA NATION

The Cayuga Nation²⁸ has no reservation of its own,²⁹ but maintains a tribal organization of chiefs, four chiefs forming the governing body, with headquarters on the Cattaraugus Reservation.³⁰

G. SHINNECOCK INDIANS

The Shinnecock Indians,³¹ occupying the 450-acre Shinnecock Reservation on Long Island, have always been distinct and separate from the Iroquois League, although at one time it is said they paid tribute to the Mohawks.

The New York Indian code³² provides for the election of three trustees by the adult males who have lived on the Shinnecock Reservation for 6 months prior to the election date.³³ These trustees have authority over tribal land and timber matters.³⁴ Authority, however, is vested in the justices of the peace in the town of Southampton to pass on issues of tribal lands proposed by the trustees.³⁵

H. POOSEPATUCK INDIANS

About a dozen families were reported in 1936 to occupy the 50-acre Poosepatuck Reservation on Long Island.³⁶ There appear to be no extant statutes specifically relating to this reservation, which had its origin in a grant by Governor William Smith in 1700.³⁷ Land matters are managed by a board of trustees, elected annually in April,³⁸ under authority of the "General Provisions" of the New York State Indian law.³⁹

"The Shinnecock Reservation, containing some 150 acres, is located on a neck of land running into Shinnecock Bay Long Island. Southampton was an early colonial town, established in the seventeenth century, and the town trustees negotiated with "Shinnecock," chief of the tribe, for a sale of the lands. Tribal tradition has it that the chief sold out to the whites and shipped with the money. While this does not comport with accepted ideas of the honesty and integrity of aboriginal chiefs, yet it is a matter of record that the town trustees of Southampton in the early days gave a lease for a thousand years to the Shinnecock Indians covering some 4,000 acres, known as the Shinnecock Hills and Shinnecock Neck. Matters stood thus until about the middle of the nineteenth century, when the town had developed to such an extent that a more satisfactory arrangement was desired. Accordingly, in 1850 the state authorized the town trustees to negotiate with the Indians for a cession of their township estate. An agreement was reached, under which the Indians surrendered the hills in exchange for which they received in fee Shinnecock Neck." (II Doc No 1690, 63d Cong., 3d sess., 1915, p. 12.)

²⁶ The Onondaga Reservation contains 4,100 acres and is located in Onondaga County about 5 miles south of the city of Syracuse. Prior to 1703 this reservation embraced something over 65,000 acres. March 11 of that year, however, the Indians sold over three-fourths of their reservation to the State, and by subsequent treaties in 1793, 1807, and 1821 the reservation was reduced to its present area. Under State laws these Indians are authorized to lease land owned or possessed by individuals, and small areas within the reservation are so leased. The lands within this reservation are not covered by the claim of the Ogden Land Co. (II Doc No 1690, 63d Cong., 3d sess., 1915, p. 12.)

³⁰ For reference to the reservation of the Cayuga and Seneca who removed to Indian Territory, see Chapter 23.

³² There are about 100 persons belonging to this tribe.

The laws governing the Indians of Oklahoma are so voluminous that analysis of them would require a treatise in itself. In fact, two treatises have already been written on the subject,¹ and at least two more are in the course of preparation. No attempt, therefore, will be made in this volume to deal in extenso with this mass of legislation or with the thousands of state and federal cases in which that legislation is applied and construed. It must be recognized, however, that in many respects the statutes and legal principles discussed in other chapters of this work as generally applicable to Indians of the United States, also apply to Oklahoma Indians, while in other respects Oklahoma Indians, or certain groups thereof, are excluded from the scope of such statutes and legal principles. In order to clarify the scope of the laws, decisions, and rulings discussed in other chapters of this work, it is therefore deemed appropriate to survey the most important fields in which Oklahoma Indians have received distinctive treatment and which present distinctive legal problems.

These fields include enrollment, property laws affecting the Five Civilized Tribes, taxation, and, among the Osages, questions of headrights, competency, wills, and leasing. In each field an effort will be to note how far principles generally applicable to Indians are applicable or inapplicable in Oklahoma, rather than to explore the distinctive problems of the various Oklahoma tribes, many of which are still unsettled by the courts.

Before proceeding to this survey, however, it is useful to pass over, in brief review, the historical background out of which the peculiarities of Oklahoma Indian law emerge.

SECTION 1. OKLAHOMA TRIBES

Reference is sometimes made to the Five Civilized Tribes (the Choctaws, Chickasaws, Chickasaws, Creeks and Seminoles), and the Osages, as if they were the only tribes resident in the State of Oklahoma.² In fact, the Indian tribes residing in the State include also the Cheyenne, Arapaho, Apache, Comanche, Kiowa, Caddo, Delaware, Wichita, Kaw, Otoe, Tonkawa, Pawnee, Ponca, Shawnee, Ottawa, Quapaw, Seneca, Wyandotte, Iowa, Sac and Fox, Kickapoo and Pottawatomie.³

² Former Commissioners of Indian Affairs Leupp cites a blunder by a Congressman who drafted an amendment which excepted from its operation "the Indians of the Indian Territory" out of which the State of Oklahoma was later carved, and of its passage by the House of Representatives in the belief that the Five Civilized Tribes were the only Indians in the Territory. Leupp, The Indian and His Problem (1910), p. 268.

Many general statutes are expressly made inapplicable to the Five Civilized Tribes,⁴ or the Osages,⁵ or to these nations, and the Osages,⁶ or to all tribes in Oklahoma.⁷ Congress has passed many special laws for Oklahoma tribes, especially for the Five Civilized Tribes and the Osages.⁸

Indians of Oklahoma number about 19,000 of which about 70 percent are of half or more Indian blood. (Hearings before the Comm on Ind Aff on S 2017, 74th Cong 1st sess, 1935, p 23.)

SECTION 2. REMOVAL.

Few of these tribes were indigenous to this part of the country. It was to Oklahoma, originally "Indian Territory," that Indians residing on lands desired by other purposes migrated or were moved by the United States Government.¹ Attorney General Taft² described the conditions under

¹ See Chapter 7, sec. 1. Tribes were moved to Oklahoma from the Atlantic seaboard many portions of the Middle West and from as far north as western New York. (Cherokee, before the Comm on Ind Aff, on H R 6241, 74th cong. 1st sess. 1915 p. 9.) The Attorney General said:

"The Cherokees were among the most powerful of the aboriginal nations, and occupied the principal part of the country now known as the States of North and South Carolina, Georgia, Alabama, and Tennessee. It was as the result of several treaties that they relinquished their sacred domain and were finally settled in some partially limited territory now occupied by them and which was accepted by them as an exchange for the territory they had abandoned and ceded to the United States.

"The treaty thus accepted, the United States, in repeated treaties, pledges its faith shall be a 'perpetual home' (treaty of 28 May, 1825, preamble, 7 Stat. 60, 117) to the Cherokees, and 'the great and peaceable possession of their country,' and that 'shall be enjoyed by them in patent subject to the single condition that the lands ceded shall 'forever be in the United States.' In view of the Indian guarantee shall become extinct or shall abandon them (treaty 12th April 1865, 7 Stat. 314, sec. 10, 24 May 1810, sec. 3, 4 Stat. 411). (Cherokee, 19 Op. A. G. 12-42-11 (1867)."

which the Five Civilized Tribes migrated to Oklahoma in the 1830's.

Where the southern portion of the United States, east of the Mississippi, was settled, the above-mentioned tribes (Cherokees, Chickasaws, Chickasaws, Creeks, and Seminoles) were occupying and claiming ownership of all that territory.

By treaty and the use of a degree of force in instances, the tribes agreed to take up their abode farther west, out of the way of the white man, on the land that was afterward designated as Indian Territory. It was a part of the consideration for the removal that they should possess the said land unmolested for ever as an independent people with their own forms of government and should not in all future time be embarrassed by having extended around them the lines of, or by having placed over them the jurisdiction of a Territory or State, or by being encroached upon by the extension in any way of the limits of an existing Territory or State.

The westward migration of these and other tribes has been considered elsewhere.³

MAINE, Its History, Antiquities and Organization (1927) pp. 94-142, discusses the history of the Five Civilized Tribes, Indian Territory and Oklahoma. SECTION 3. SELF-GOVERNMENT⁴

Various guarantees of tribal self-government and of territorial integrity were made to induce the Indians to sign "removal" treaties. The Supreme Court in the case of *Atlantic and Pacific Railroad Company v. Minors*⁵ described some of the guarantees.

"... a reference to some of the treaties, under which it [the Indian Territory] is held by the Indians, indicates that it stands in an entirely different relation to the United States from other Territories, and that for most purposes it is to be considered as an independent country. Thus in the treaty of December 20, 1855, 7 Stat. 478, with the Cherokees, whereby the United States granted and conveyed by patent to the Cherokees a portion of this territory, the United States, in article II, covenanted and agreed that the land ceded to the Cherokees should 'in no future time, without their consent, be included within the territorial limits or jurisdiction of any State or Territory,' and by further treaty of August 16, 1846 9 Stat. 871, provided (Art. 7) 'that the lands now occupied by the Cherokee Nation shall be secured to the whole Cherokee people for their common use and benefit, and a patent shall be issued for the same.' So, too, by treaty with the Choctaws of September 27, 1830, 7 Stat. 333, granting a portion of the Indian Territory to them, the United States (Art. 4) 'ceded to the Choctaw Nation of Red People the jurisdiction and government of all the persons and property that may be within their limits, west, so that no Territory or State shall ever have the right to pass laws for the government of the Choctaw Nation of Red People and their descendants, and that no part of the land granted shall ever be ceded to any Territory or State, but the United States shall forever secure said Choctaw Nation from, and against, all laws except such as from time to time may be enacted in their own national councils, not inconsistent,' etc. And in a treaty of March 24, 1832, 7 Stat. 586, with the Creeks (Art. 14), the Creek country west of the Mississippi was solemnly guaranteed to these Indians, 'that shall any State or Territory ever have a right to pass laws for the government of such Indians, but they shall be allowed to govern themselves, so far as may be compatible with the general jurisdiction which Congress may think proper to exercise over them.'

Under the guarantees of these and other similar treaties the Indians have proceeded to establish and carry on independent governments of their own, enacting and executing their own laws, punishing their own criminals, appointing their own officers, raising and expending their own revenues. Their position, as early as 1855, is indicated by the following extract from the opinion of this court in Markey v. Oar, 38 How. 100, 103:

"A question has been suggested whether the Cherokee people should be considered or treated as a foreign state or territory. The fact that they are under the Constitution of the Union, and subject to acts of Congress regulating trade, is a sufficient answer to the suggestion. They are not only within our jurisdiction, but the faith of the nation is pledged for their protection. In some respects they bear the same relation to the Federal Government as a Territory did in its second grade of Government under the ordinance of 1787. Such Territory passed its own laws, subject to the approval of Congress, and its inhabitants were subject to the Constitution and acts of Congress. The principal difference consists in the fact that the Cherokees enact their own laws, under the restriction stated, appoint their own officers, and pay their own expenses. This, however, is no reason why the laws and proceedings of the Cherokee territory, so far as relates to rights claimed under them, should not be placed upon the same footing as other Territories in the Union. It is not a foreign, but a domestic territory—a Territory which originated under our Constitution and laws."

Similar language is used with reference to these Indians in Holden v. Joy, 17 Wall. 211, 242. * * * (17p. 435-437)

Practically all of the Oklahoma tribes were well organized when they moved to the Indian Territory, and in the new land

They maintained complete government, particularly in the East, five tribe areas, they had their own schools, their own legislative assemblies, their own courts. And they did the job well. Under all the conditions they made a record which would have been creditable to any municipality or State in this country."

Certain of the Five Civilized Tribes adopted the political forms of the white world; and administrative Indians and opium have frequently upheld their power of self-government."

The Attorney General in advancing the Secretary of the Treasury that a national bank cannot lawfully be established at Muskogee, a town in the territory of the Creek Nation, said:

The right of the Creek Nation to govern itself was carefully guarded and protected by these treaties in a pact founded on a consideration of great value, moving directly from the Creek Nation to the United States and the United States to the Creek Nation, in the protection of the Creeks in all the rights secured to them by the treaties mentioned. (10 Op. A. G. 842, 614 (1889).)

The Supreme Court in Worcester v. United States, 215 U. S. 154 (1919), said:

The Creek of Muskogee Nation or Tribe of Indians, had in 1860, a population of 15,000. Subject to the control of Congress, they then constituted within a defined territory the power of a sovereign people having a tribal organization, their own system of laws, and a government with the usual branches, executive, legislative, and judicial. The territory was divided into six districts, and each district was provided with a judge. (2p. 361-363.)

The Supreme Court in the case of Martin v. Leutenell, 270 U. S. 78, 60-67 (1926), said:

For many years the Creeks maintained a government of their own, with executive legislative and judicial branches. They were located in the Indian Territory and occupied a large district which belonged to the tribe as a community and not to the member. It is to be noted in common. The situation was the same with the Chickasaw, Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Seminole tribes with the Creeks, and the Five Civilized Tribes. All were under the guardianship of the United States and within territory over which it had plenary jurisdiction, thus enabling it to exercise full control over them and their districts whenever it perceived a need therefor. SECTION 4. GOVERNMENT OF INDIAN TERRITORY

As a result of the subjugation of the Five Civilized Tribes to the Confederacy during the Civil War, the President of the United States was empowered to allocate existing treaties with these Indians.¹⁷ Accordingly during 1866 new treaties were negotiated with each of the tribes.¹⁸ For the purpose of forming a federated Indian government of the tribes, certain identical provisions were inserted in each treaty.¹⁹ Though the plan failed to materialize,²⁰ the territory intended to be thus organized became known as the Indian Territory.²¹

Soon it was apparent that the seclusion and isolation which the Indians sought was to be disturbed. Land-hungry whites overflowed into the Indian Territory and reached about a quarter of a million at the beginning of the last decade of the nineteenth century.²² Despite treaty obligations, many whites, strongly desirous to substitute their own methods of government for those of the tribes. In part this was due to the fact that Indian laws and customs had no jurisdiction over the white settlers,²³ and the Indian Territory became the refuge for criminals from neighboring states. By the Act of May 2, 1890,²⁴ a portion of the Indian Territory was created into the Territory of Oklahoma. This act provided that until after the adjournment of the first territorial assembly the provisions of the compiled laws of Nebraska with respect to probate courts and decedents, so far as locally applicable and consistent with the laws of the United States and that act, should be in force in the Territory of Oklahoma. The act also provided that as to the portion of the former Indian Territory comprising the lands of the Five Civilized Tribes, and lands occupied by other tribes and certain other lands described in the act, the laws of Arkansas, as published in Marshall's Digest in 1884, including descent and distribution, should be operative therein until Congress should otherwise provide, insofar as those laws were not locally in-applicable not in conflict with any law of Congress at the provisions of the act.

Under the provisions of this act the legitimacy of the Territory of Oklahoma during its first session, which expired on December 21, 1890 passed laws of descent in succession which became effective on that date. Concerning the laws of that portion of the Indian Territory which continued to be so designated, Assistant Attorney General for the Interior Department, later, Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, Van Devanter, in an opinion dated October 15, 1898 after pointing out that the laws of descent and distribution of Arkansas were in conflict with the provisions of the General Allotment Act referred to above, held that such laws, under the 1890 Act were inapplicable to the estates of Indian allottees in the Indian Territory and therefore that the laws of Kansas, as provided in the General Allotment Act did not apply to the Quipwite tribe. The Arkansas law, under the Act of 1890 applied to the Indians of that tribe. After this preliminary decision in 1894 Congress inaugurated a policy of liquidating the tribal existence and government of the Five Civilized Tribes and affording them lands in severalty. Agreements were negotiated by the Dawes Commission with each of the tribes in order to carry out these objectives.¹ The Supreme Court has described this condition and the resulting legislation in the case of Martin v. Littleton -

In time the tribes came, through advance settlement, to be surrounded by a large and increasing white

The act of Congress adopting an entire code of laws for the Indian Territory is put to resolve the limited and restricted constitution placed upon the powers of the court (section 914, law 98) which means that the court counts to conform the practice and procedure in those courts to the practice and procedure in the state courts (see note as may be found in (29, 98, 70)).

population many of the whites entering the district and having, their - some as tenant farmers, stock growers and mechanics and others as more adventures. The United States then perceived a need for making a larger use of its power. [Hickman v. United States, 221 U. S. 413, 414, 415, 89 (1909); Wheeler v. Wheeler, 245 U. S. 441, 442.] What it did in that regard has a bearing on the questions before stated. (P. 61)

By an act March 1, 1890, c. 33, 23 Stat. 783, a special court was established for the Indian Territory and given jurisdiction of many offenses against the United States and of certain civil cases where not wholly between persons of Indian blood. By an act of May 2, 1890, c. 182, ss. 2-11, 26 Stat. 81, that jurisdiction was enlarged and several general statutes of the State of Arkansas, but held in Mann-Elford's Digest, were put in force in the Territory so far as not locally inapplicable or in conflict with laws of Congress, but those provisions were requested by others in the effect that the courts of each tribe should retain exclusive jurisdiction of all cases wholly between members of the tribe and that the adopted Arkansas statutes should not apply to such cases. By an act of March 4, 1894, c. 279, § 4, 27 Stat. 614, a commission to the five civilized tribes was created and specially authorized to conduct negotiations with each of the tribes looking to the allotment of a part of its lands among its members to some appropriate disposal of the remaining lands and to further adjustments preparatory to the dissolution of the tribe. By an act of June 7, 1897, c. 8, 30 Stat. 58-64, the special court was given exclusive jurisdiction of all crime cases, civil and criminal, and the laws of the United States and the State of Arkansas in force in the Territory were made applicable to "all persons therein, irrespective of race," but with the qualification that any agreement negotiated by the commission with any of the five civilized tribes, when ratified, should supersede as to such tribe any conflicting provisions in the act. By an act of June 28, 1898, c. 517, §§ 20 and 25, 30 Stat. 493, the enforcement of tribal laws in the special court was forbidden and the tribal courts were abolished.

Thus the congressional enactment gradually came to the point where they displaced the tribal laws and put in force in the Territory a body of laws adopted from the statutes of Arkansas and intended to reach Indians, as well as white persons, except as they might be inapplicable in particular situations or might be superseded as to any of the five civilized tribes by future agreements. (P. 61-62.)

By the Act of April 28, 1904,⁴ it was provided that

All the laws of Arkansas heretofore put in force in the Indian Territory are hereby continued and extended in their operation, so as to embrace all persons and estates in said Territory, whether Indian, freedmen, or otherwise, and full and complete notice of the tribal laws and of the district courts in said Territory in the settlements of all estates of decedents, the guardianships of minors and incompetents, whether Indians, freedmen, or otherwise. * * *

SECTION 5. STATEHOOD

The virtual dissolution of the tribal governments in the Indian Territory cleared the way for the creation of another state. Accordingly on June 16, 1906,⁵ an act was passed making possible the admission into the Union of both Indian Territory and Oklahoma Territory as the State of Oklahoma. This so-called enabling act has been well summarized by the Supreme Court in Jefferson v. Pack -

By the enabling act of June 16, 1906, c. 3335, § 4 Stat. 207, provision was made for admitting into the Union at the time of the enabling act there was a large population of Indians in the Indian Territory, but a much larger population of whites both the Territory of Oklahoma and the Indian Territory is the State of Oklahoma. Each Territory had a distinct body of local laws. Those in the Indian Territory, as we have seen, had been put in force there by Congress. Those in the Territory of Oklahoma had been enacted by the territorial legislature. Deeming it better that the new State should come into the Union with a body of laws applying with practical uniformity throughout the State, Congress provided by the enabling act (18 191) that "the laws in force in the Territory of Oklahoma, as far as applicable, shall extend over and apply to said State until changed by the legislative thereof," and also (18 21) that "all laws in force in the Territory of Oklahoma at the time of the admission of said State into the Union shall be in force throughout said State, except as modified or changed by this act or by the constitution of the State." The people of the State, taking the same view, provided in their constitution (Art. 27, § 2) that "all laws in force in the Territory of Oklahoma at the time of the admission of the State into the Union which are not repugnant to this Constitution and which are not locally inapplicable, shall be extended to and remain in force in the State of Oklahoma until they expire by their own limitation or are altered or repealed by law" (17p. 292-293).

It should be noted that the act expressly provides that Federal authority over the Indians should in no way be impaired, nor should the property rights of the Indians be limited.¹

On November 16, 1907, the Territory of Oklahoma and the Indian Territory were admitted into the Union as the State of Oklahoma under the enabling act passed by Congress on June 20, 1906,² as amended by the Act of March 4, 1907.³ The enabling act and the constitution of the new state united in declaring that with certain exceptions, no material here, "the

The requirement by Congress and the acceptance by the State that "every member of any Indian nation or tribe located within the State should be permitted to participate in the organization and conduct of the government of the State" conferred upon all such Indians citizenship in the State and in the United States.

Allotments to the members of the various Indian tribes in Oklahoma had been substantially completed at the time of the admission of Oklahoma to statehood. * * * (Bleeker Indian Land Laws, (2d ed. 1914), p. 97.)

Ohio*, 241 U. S. 582 (1916).

SECTION 6. TERMINATION OF TRIBAL GOVERNMENT—FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES

The Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes, first known as the Dawes Commission, pieced the groundwork for the termination of the tribes by procuring agreements with the several nations relative to the allotment of their lands.⁴ Commissioner Collier has said:⁵

* * * the time came when the pressure of white population made inevitable a break-up of the Indian territory, a break-up of the Indian ownership of that vast domain. That break-up was sought through allotting the land in severalty. In addition the tribal governments were practically abolished by statute. And the tribal treasuries were dismantled with the United States Treasury, but the fundamental technique was allotting the lands in laws in force in the Territory of Oklahoma" at the time of the State's admission should be in force throughout the state and that the "limits of original jurisdiction of such State" should be the successors of "all courts of original jurisdiction of said Territories." The laws of the Territory of Oklahoma which were thus put in force "throughout" the new state included comprehensive provisions for the administration of estates of decedents, the appointment of guardians of minors and incompetents, and the management and sale of their property. In the Territory of Oklahoma this jurisdiction was vested in probate courts and by the constitution of the new state that jurisdiction was committed to the county courts.⁶

The general condition existing in the State of Oklahoma at the time of its admission to the Union has been described as follows:⁷

Oklahoma, with 1,700,000 population, became a State on November 16, 1907, upon a pledge contained in her constitution that she would never question the jurisdiction of the Federal Government over the Indians and their lands or its power to legislate by law or regulation concerning their rights or property. Immediately she had a delegation in Congress, and at once began a determined campaign for further repeal of the laws enacted for the protection of the Indians. The main argument employed was that the Indians were competent to care for their property and needed no legislative protection against improvidence, that the State could be trusted to afford them all the protection they required and that Federal guardianship and supervision should cease, as an interference with the personal privileges and rights of citizens of Oklahoma.

This fight * * * resulted in the enactment of a law on May 27, 1908, effective July 27, 1908, repealing the restriction on the sale of a large class of land, including all homesteads of freedmen and of mixed bloods of less than half blood, freeing them restrictions all told over 9,720,000 acres. It provided also that all homesteads, as well as all lands from which restrictions against sale were removed, should become liable the same as lands of white people whether sold by the allottee or not. This late act violated the terms of the agreement made with the Indians under which the homesteads of the Choctaw and the allotments, or parts thereof, of the Cherokee and other tribes were exempted from taxation for a given period. (The American Indian, by Warren K. Moonshend, the Andrew Press, Andover, Mass., p. 142.)

severalty and that was done and at various times restrictions were lifted and methods were applied in various parts of the State different from those applied to the tribes in the West. And there grew up roughly two bodies of Indian law, one affecting the five tribes and largely the Osages, the other affecting the tribes of the West, and who had mostly come from the plains area.

The termination of the tribal governments is described by Dr. Commissioner of Indian Affairs Leupp:⁸

* * * by successive acts of Congress the Five Civilized Tribes were shown of their governmental functions, their courts were abolished and United States courts established, their chief executive officers were made subject to removal by the President, who was authorized to fill by appointment the vacancies thus created, provision was made for the suppression of their tribal schools by a public school system maintained by general taxation; their tribal laws were abolished; the sale of their public buildings and lands was ordered, their legislatures were forbidden to remain in session more than thirty days in any one year, and every legislative act, ordinance and resolution was declared null and void unless it received the approval of the President. The only present shadow of fiction of the survival of the tribes as tribes is their gradual recognition left all their property, or the proceeds thereof, can be distributed among the individual members. As one of the federal judges has summed up this is "a continuance of the tribes in mere legal effect, and as in many States corporations are continued as legal entities after they have ceased to do business and are practically dissolved, for the purpose of winding up their affairs" (17 Id. 227-227).

The Act of June 28, 1898, commonly known as the Curtis Act abolished tribal courts¹ and declared Indian law unenforceable in federal courts.² The Supreme Court in the case of *Morris v. Hitchcock*³ explained the purpose of the Curtis Act in regard to one of the Five Civilized Tribes.

Viewing the Curtis Act in the light of the previous decisions of this court and the dealings between the Chickasaws and the United States, we are of opinion that one of the objects attending the adoption of that act by Congress, having in view the peace and welfare of the Chickasaws, was to prevent the continued exercise by the legislative body of the tribe of such a power as is here complained of, subject to a veto power in the President over such legislation as a preventive of arbitrary and impulsive action. (P. 303.)

In agreement,⁴ in statute,⁵ provisions were made for the termination of the tribal governments by March 4, 1903, at the latest. It was thought that by that time the tribal land would be allotted. However, the necessity for the continuance of the tribes became apparent before the date set for their demise and the Joint Resolution of March 2, 1900,⁶ provided for the continuance of tribal existence and government of these tribes until the distribution of the tribal property "unless hereafter otherwise provided by law." The next month a comprehensive law was passed covering all the tribes.

The Act of April 26, 1900,⁷ provided for the final disposition of the affairs of the Five Civilized Tribes. It provided for the completion by the Secretary of the Interior of the enrollments of the tribal members, and set comprising the freedmen and the second remaining members. It empowered the President of the United States to remove the principal chief of the Choctaw, Cherokee, Creek, or Seminole tribe, at the governor of the Chickasaw tribe for failure to perform his duties, and to "fill any vacancy arising from removal, disability or death of the incumbent, by appointment of a citizen by blood of the tribe." The Secretary of the Interior was granted considerable power in regard to tribal affairs including control of tribal schools,⁸ the collection of tribal revenues,⁹ and funds,¹⁰ sale of certain tribal lands, buildings and other property of the tribes,¹¹ and the per capita distribution of tribal funds.¹² Section 27 provided that the lands of the Five Civilized Tribes upon their dissolution "shall be held in trust by the United States for the use and benefit of the Indians" of each of the tribes "and their heirs" as shown by the final rolls.

Section 28 provided for the continuance of tribal existence and the present tribal governments with limited powers. Their actions were made subject to the approval of the President of the United States.¹³

Mr. Justice Van Devanter in the case of *Southern Surety Company v. Oklahoma*¹⁴ described the formation of the State of Oklahoma and contrasted it with the previous government of the Territory by Congress.

By reason of the conditions arising out of the presence of the Five Civilized Tribes no organized territorial government was ever established in the Indian Territory. Up to the time it became a part of the State of Oklahoma it was governed under the immediate direction of Congress, which legislated for it in respect of many matters of local or domestic concern which in a State are regulated by the state legislature, and also applied to it many laws dealing with subjects which under the Constitution are within Federal rather than state control. In what was done Congress did not contemplate that the situation should be of long duration, but on the contrary that the Territory should be prepared for early inclusion in a State. Courts designated as "United States courts" were temporarily established and invested with a considerable measure of civil and criminal jurisdiction, and there was also provision for beginning public prosecutions before subordinate magistrates. There being no organized local government, such prosecutions, regardless of their nature, were commenced and conducted in the name of the United States, and in taking bail bonds it was assumed by the obligee.

The Enabling Act, June 16, 1906, c. 3838, § 4 Stat. 267; March 4, 1907, c. 2511, § 1288, provided that the new State should embrace the Indian Territory as well as the Territory of Oklahoma. It contemplated that the State, by its constitution, would establish a system of courts of its own, and provided for dividing the State into two districts and creating therein United States courts like those in other States. The temporary courts were to go out of existence and this made it necessary to provide for the disposition of the business pending before them in various stages. (Pp. 284-285.)

SECTION 7. ENROLLMENT—FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES

The general policy of the Federal Government for a number of years had been to bring about the allotment in severalty of tribal property with certain restrictions upon alienation, and to confer citizenship, state and national, upon allottees.¹ The Dawes Commission, appointed by virtue of the Act of March 8, 1883,² had undertaken to negotiate with the Five Civilized Tribes for just such a purpose. However, after three years of attempt-

That said commission is further authorized and directed to proceed at once to hear and determine the application of all persons who may apply to them for citizenship in any of said nations, and after such hearing they shall determine the right of such applicant to be so admitted and enrolled. Provided, however, That such application shall be made to such Commissioners within three months after the passage of this Act. The said commission shall decide all such applications within ninety days after the same shall be made. That in determining all such applications said commission shall respect all laws of the several nations of tribes, not inconsistent with the laws of the United States, and all treaties with either of said nations of tribes, and shall give due force and effect to the rolls, usages, and customs of each of said nations, or tribes. And provided further, That the rolls of citizenship of the several tribes as now existing are hereby confirmed, and any person who shall claim to be entitled to be added to said rolls as a citizen of either of said tribes and whose right thereto has either been denied or not acted upon, or any citizen who may within three months from and after the passage of this Act desire such citizenship, may apply to the legally constituted court or committee designated by the several tribes for such citizenship and such court or committee shall determine such application within thirty days from the date thereof.

In the performance of such duties, said commission shall have power and authority to administer oaths, to issue process for and compel the attendance of witnesses, and to send for persons and papers, and all depositions and affidavits and other evidence in any form whatsoever heretofore taken where the witnesses, jurors and testimony are dead or now residing beyond the limits of said Territory, and to use every fair and reasonable means within their reach for the purpose of determining the rights of persons claiming such citizenship, or to protect any of said nations from fraud or wrong, and the rolls so prepared by them shall be hereafter held and considered to be the true and correct rolls of persons entitled to the rights of citizenship in said several tribes. Provided, That if the tribe, or any person, be aggrieved with the decision of the tribal authorities or the commission provided for in this Act, or if he may appeal from such decision to the United States district court. Provided, however, That the appeal shall be taken within sixty days and the judgment of the court shall be final.

That the said commission, after the expiration of six months, shall cause a complete roll of citizenship of each of said nations to be made up from their records, and add thereto the names of citizens whose right may be conferred under this Act, and said rolls shall be, and are hereby, made rolls of citizenship of said nations in tribe, subject, however, to the determination of the United States courts, as provided herein.

The commission is hereby required to file the lists of members as they finally approve them with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs to remain there for use as the final judgment of the duly constituted authorities. And said commission shall also make a roll of freedmen entitled to citizenship in said tribes and shall include their names in the lists of members to be filed with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs. And said commission is further authorized and directed to make a full report to Congress of leases, tribal and individual, with the area, amount and value of the property leased and the amount received therefor and by whom and from whom said property is leased, and is further directed to make a full and detailed report as to the excessive holdings of members of said tribes and others.

It is hereby declared to be the duty of the United States to establish a government in the Indian Territory which will rectify the many inequalities and discriminations now existing in said Territory and afford needed protection to the lives and property of all citizens and residents thereof.

The following further provisions regarding enrollment were made the next year in the Act of June 7, 1897:²

That said commission shall continue to exercise all authority heretofore conferred on it by law to negotiate with the Five Tribes, and any agreement made by it with any one of said tribes, when ratified, shall operate to suspend any provisions of this Act in conflict therewith as to said nation. Provided That the words "rolls of citizenship" as used in the Act of June tenth, eighteen hundred and ninety-six, making appropriations for critical and contingent expenses of the Indian Department and fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the fiscal year ending June thirtieth, eighteen hundred and ninety-seven, shall be construed to mean the last authenticated rolls of each tribe which have been approved by the council of the nation and the descendants of those appearing on such rolls, and such additional names and their descendants as have been subsequently added, either by the council of said nation, the duly authorized courts thereof, or the commission under the Act of June tenth, eighteen hundred and ninety-six. And all other names appearing upon such rolls shall be open to investigation by said commission for a period of six months after the passage of this Act. And any name appearing on such rolls and not confirmed by the Act of June tenth, eighteen hundred and ninety-six, as herein construed, may be stricken therefrom by such commission where the party affected shall have ten days previous notice that said commission will investigate and determine the right of such party to remain upon such roll as a citizen of such nation. Provided also That any one whose name shall be stricken from the roll by such commission shall have the right of appeal, as provided in the Act of June tenth, eighteen hundred and ninety-six.

The determination of Congress to proceed with allotment without the consent of the tribes found expression in the Act of June 28, 1898,³ commonly called the Curtis Act.⁴ This act contained elaborate stipulations regarding enrollment, providing for two rolls for each of the Civilized Tribes, one tracing rights through former slaves, called the Freedmen roll, the other tracing such rights through Indian blood, called the Indian roll,⁵ for making the rolls descriptive of the persons thereon⁶ and for making them "alone constitute the several tribes which they represent."⁷

Act of May 31, 1908, sec. 2, 35 Stat. 112 provided that the rolls of Freedmen of the Five Civilized Tribes approved by the Secretary of the Interior shall be conclusive evidence of the quantum of Indian blood in any enrolled freedmen of said tribe and the enrollment records of the Commission, conclusive evidence of their age. After being entered on rolls made and approved by the Secretary of the Interior, in accordance with a statute, a freedman acquired rights, which could not be divested without notice of hearing essential to due process of law. Geisfeld v. Goldsby, 211 U. S. 246 (1908). No one to an attorney of such freedman is sufficient if given a few hours before a hearing of a motion to strike out his name on the ground that his enrollment was procured by perjury. *United States v. The effect of the enrollment statutes has been considered from time to time. In the case of United States v. Alkots,¹ the Supreme Court said:

In United States v. Wadswold, 241 U. S. 111, 118, 119, it was insisted that the Indian died prior to April 1, 1891, and that his enrollment as of that date was beyond the jurisdiction of the Dawes Commission and void within the doctrine of Scott v. Alkots, 154 U. S. 84. Much consideration was given to the statutes relating and defining the powers of the Commission and the effect of an enrollment. This Court said:

"There was thus constituted a quasi-judicial tribunal whose judgments within the limits of its jurisdiction were only subject to attack for fraud or such mistake of law or fact as would justify the holding that its judgments were voidable. Congress by this legislation evidenced an intention to put an end to controversies by providing a tribunal before which those interested could be heard and the rolls authoritatively made up of those who were entitled to participate in the partition of the tribal lands. It was to the interest of all concerned that the beneficiaries of this division should be ascertained. To this end the Commission was established and endowed with authority to hear and determine the matter. * * *

"When the Commission proceeded in good faith to determine the matter and to act upon information before it, not arbitrarily, but according to its best judgment, we think it was the intention of the act that the matter, upon the approval of the Secretary, should be finally concluded and the rights of the parties forever settled subject to such attacks as could successfully be made upon judgments of this character for fraud or mistake."

"We cannot agree that the case is within the principles decided in Scott v. Alkots, 154 U. S. 84, and limited cases, in which it has been held that in the absence of a subject-matter of jurisdiction an application that there was such is not conclusive, and that a judgment based upon action without its proper subject being in existence is void. * * * We think the decision of such tribunal, when not impeached for fraud or mistake, conclusive of the question of membership in the tribe, when followed, as was the case here, by the action of the Interior Department confirming the allotment and ordering the patents conveying the lands, which were in fact issued."

It must be accepted now as finally settled that the enrollment of a member of an Indian tribe by the Dawes Commission, when duly approved, amounts to a judgment in an adversary proceeding determining the existence of the individual and his right to membership subject, of course, to impeachment under the well established rules where such judgments are involved. (174-226)

Shortly after the passage of the Curtis Act, Congress, by Act of July 1, 1888,² adopted the agreement concluded with the Seminoles on December 10, 1867. Conveyed now of the integrity of resistance, other tribes followed suit, until by the end of 1902 all of the Five Civilized Tribes had become parties to agreements with the United States providing for allotment to land in severalty.³ Most of these agreements⁴ contained provisions concerning enrollment. Sections 25 to 31 of the Cherokee Agreement⁵ are perhaps typical.

Sec. 25 The roll of citizens of the Cherokee Nation shall be made as of September first, nineteen hundred and two, and the names of all persons then living and entitled to enrollment on that date shall be placed on said roll by the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes.

Sec. 26 The names of all persons living on the first day of September, nineteen hundred and two, entitled to be enrolled as provided in section twenty-five hereof, shall be placed upon the roll made by said Commission, and no child born thereafter to a citizen, and no white person who has intermarried with a Cherokee citizen since the sixteenth day of December, eighteen hundred and ninety-five, shall be entitled to enrollment or to participate in the distribution of the tribal property of the Cherokee Nation.

Sec. 27 Such rolls shall in all other respects be made in strict compliance with the provisions of section twenty-one of the Act of Congress approved June twenty-eighth, eighteen hundred and ninety-eight (Thirtieth Statutes, page four hundred and ninety-eight), and the Act of Congress approved May thirty-first, nineteen hundred (Thirty-first Statutes, page two hundred and twenty-one).

Sec. 28 No person whose name appears upon the roll made by the Dawes Commission as a citizen or freedman of any other tribe shall be enrolled as a citizen of the Cherokee Nation.

Sec. 29 For the purpose of expediting the enrollment of the Cherokee citizens and the allotment of lands as herein provided, the said Commission shall, from time to time, and as soon as practicable, forward to the Secretary of the Interior lists upon which shall be placed the names of those persons found by the Commission to be entitled to enrollment. The lists thus prepared, when approved by the Secretary of the Interior, shall constitute a part and parcel of the final roll of citizens of the Cherokee tribe, upon which allotment of land and distribution of other tribal property shall be made. When there shall have been submitted to and approved by the Secretary of the Interior lists embracing the names of all those lawfully entitled to enrollment, the roll shall be deemed complete. The roll so prepared shall be made in quadruplicate, one to be deposited with the Secretary of the Interior, one with the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, one with the principal chief of the Cherokee Nation, and one to remain with the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes.

Sec. 30 During the months of September and October, in the year nineteen hundred and two, the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes may cause to be made an enrollment of such infant children as may have been born to recognized and enrolled citizens of the Cherokee Nation on or before the first day of September, nineteen hundred and two, but the application of no person whose date of enrollment shall be removed after the thirty-first day of October, nineteen hundred and two.

Sec. 31 No person whose name does not appear upon the roll prepared as herein provided shall be entitled to in any manner participate in the distribution of the common property of the Cherokee tribe, and those whose names appear thereon shall participate in the manner set forth in this Act. That an allotment of land or other tribal property shall be made to any person, or to the heirs of any person, whose name is on said roll and who died prior to the first day of September, nineteen hundred and two. The right of such person in any interest in the lands or other tribal property shall be deemed to have become extinguished and to have passed to the tribe in general upon his death before said date, and any person or persons who may conceal the death of anyone on said roll as aforesaid for the purpose of profiting by said concealment, and who shall knowingly reserve any portion of any land or other tribal property or of the proceeds so arising from any allotment prohibited by this section, shall be deemed guilty of a felony and shall be proceeded against as may be provided in other cases of felony, and the penalty for this offense shall be confinement at hard labor for a period of not less than one year nor more than five years, and in addition thereof a forfeiture to the Cherokee Nation of the lands, other real property, and possessions so obtained.

"The Choctaw- Chickasaw Agreement" contained an unusual enrollment device. A quasi-judicial body was established in sections 91-93, which has been described as follows:—

"It appears that the agreement in these paragraphs provides for the establishment of the Choctaw and Chickasaw Citizenship Court, and gives it jurisdiction of a test suit to annul and vacate the decisions of the United States courts in the Indian Territory admitting persons to citizenship and enrollment as citizens of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations, respectively, on the ground of want of notice to both of said nations and because the United States courts acted with abuse of power. With a trial, in the event such judgments should be annulled because of either or both of the irregularities mentioned on the part of any party thus deprived of a favorable judgment to remove his case to the Citizenship court, where such further proceedings were to be had therein as ought to have been had in the court to which the same was taken on appeal from the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes, and if no judgment or decision had been rendered fifteen days after the appeal was taken, or judgment of the courts in Indian Territory, rendered under said act of Congress of June tenth, eighteen hundred and ninety-six, admitting persons to citizenship or to enrollment in either of said nations." In the exercise of such appellate jurisdiction the citizenship court was "authorized to consider, review, and reverse all such judgments, both as to findings of fact and conclusions of law, and may, whenever in its judgment substantial justice will thereby be subserved, permit either party to any such appeal to take and present such further course as may be necessary to enable said court to determine the very right of the controversy."

"It will be noted that the agreement further provides (paragraph 89) that 'the judgment of the citizenship court in any or all of the suits or proceedings so committed to its jurisdiction shall be final.' (P. 143.)

Congress was now anxious to bring to a close the work of enrollment, and in 1904, 1905, and 1906 legislative steps were taken to bring this about. These have been summarized by the Attorney General:—

"By the act of April 21, 1904 (33 Stat. 189, 201), it was provided that the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes should conclude its work and terminate on or before July 1, 1905, and cease to exist on that date, the powers heretofore conferred upon it being continued.

"By the act of March 3, 1905 (33 Stat. 1048, 1060), it was provided 'that the work of completing the unfinished business, if any, of the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes shall devolve upon the Secretary of the Interior, and that all the powers heretofore granted to the said Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes are hereby conferred upon the said Secretary on and after the first of July, nineteen hundred and five.'"

"By the act of April 20, 1906 (34 Stat. 187), it was provided:

"That after the approval of this act no person shall be enrolled as a citizen or freedman of the Choctaw, Chickasaw, Cherokee, Creek, or Seminole tribes of Indians in the Indian Territory, except as herein otherwise provided, unless application for enrollment was made prior to December first, nineteen hundred and five, and the records in charge of the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes shall be conclusive evidence as to the fact of such application, and no motion to reopen or reconsider any citizenship case, in any of said tribes, shall be entertained unless filed with the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes within sixty days after the date of the order or decision sought to be reconsidered except as to decisions made prior to the passage of this act, in which cases such motion shall be made within sixty days after the passage of this act."

By that time the rolls of citizenship of the several tribes were required to be completed by March 4, 1907 (19 P. 112-113).

The act of May 27, 1908," made conclusive the enrollment records of the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes as to the age of the citizens and freedmen. At the request of Mr. Bledsoe, the Commissioner prepared the following statement of what constituted the enrollment records in his office:

"The enrollment records in the matter of the enrollment of any person as a citizen or freedman of the Five Civilized Tribes, consist of the application made for their enrollment, together with all of the records, evidence and other papers filed in connection therewith prior to the rendition of the decision granting the application.

"In the early days of enrollment in the Five Civilized Tribes appointments were made by the Commission at various places in the different nations at which the Indians and freedmen appeared to make application for enrollment. At that time the applicants were duly sworn before a notary public, but their testimony was only taken orally and placed upon a card, with the exception of the Choctaw. Written testimony was taken in all Choctaw cases. In a great majority of the early enrollments, except Choctaw cases, the only records shown are the statements that were thus taken from the applicants personally and placed on the cards, which constitute the enrollment record, together with other oral evidence that may have been obtained. In a great many instances, at that time, where there was doubt as to the rights of the applicants to enrollment, and they could not then be identified from the tribal rolls, the written testimony of the applicants was taken and made a part of the record. Additional testimony was also taken at later dates.

"As the work proceeded, and the enrollment of all persons in blood or intermarriage, and freedmen, who were clearly identified upon the tribal rolls, was completed, written testimony was taken in all doubtful cases. Written testimony was also taken in all applications made for the identification of Mississippi Choctaws, and in practically all other cases as the work neared completion.

"The tribal rolls of the various nations came into the possession of the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes, and were used for identification and as a basis for enrollment.

"As enrollments were completed, the names of all persons whom the Commission had decided were entitled to enrollment were placed on the rolls. These rolls show the name, age, sex, degree of blood, and the number of the census card, which is generally known as the "enrollment card," on which each citizen was enrolled, and a number was placed opposite each name appearing on this roll, beginning at 1 and running down until the last number was completed. This roll was made out in quadruplicate and forwarded to the Secretary of the Interior for his approval, who approved same if he found no objections thereto and returned the same copies for the files of this office. The roll thus approved is known as the "approval roll," and is the basis on which allotments were made, except in the cases of a large number of Choctaws, to whom allotments were made before the approval of their enrollment, which allotments were subsequently confirmed by Congress.

"The Secretary of the Interior holds, for the purposes of the government, that the date of the application to enrollment shall be continued as the date of the annuversary of the birth of the applicant, unless the records show otherwise.

The Act of Congress makes the enrollment records of the Commissioner to the Five Civilized Tribes conclusive evidence in determining the ages of allottees of the Five Civilized Tribes. "The enrollment records consist of

First, what is known as the "census card," that is, the card on which the applicant was listed for enrollment. Sometimes in the early enrollment some persons were listed on what is known as a "doubtful card," and later on the names appearing on the doubtful cards were transferred to a regular census card, when the Commissioner rendered his decision holding that they were entitled to enrollment. It has been observed, in looking over the enrollment records in many cases, that sometimes the date shown on the lower right-hand corner is the date on which they were transferred from the doubtful card, and not the date on which application was made for their enrollment. In such cases, in the absence of any other testimony or evidence, the date shown on the doubtful card is the date on which application was made for enrollment.

SECTION 3. ALIENATION AND TAXATION OF ALLOTTED LANDS OF FIVE TRIBES

Basic statutes controlling the alienability and invalidity of the lands of individual members of the Five Civilized Tribes may be divided into two groups. Those dealing with specific tribes and those applicable in all of the Five Civilized Tribes."

"A few statutes applied in part to the Five Civilized Tribes and in part to one of the tribes. The following are the statutes which relate to the Five Civilized Tribes: The Act of June 28, 1908, 20 Stat. 465. The latter part (§§ 353-315) comprised the Alaska Agreement with the Chockchee and Chickasaw which is discussed in sec 811 of this chapter. The only portion of the Chickasaw Act supplemental to the Act of March 1, 1890, 26 Stat. 755, see 15, Act of March 2, 1900, 30 Stat. 51, Act of March 3, 1901, 27 Stat. 912, 941; Act of June 10, 1900, 20 Stat. 321, 329. It was supplemented by the Act of March 3, 1890, 30 Stat. 1074, Act of March 3, 1900, 30 Stat. 1211, Act of June 2, 1900, 31 Stat. 350, Act of March 1, 1901, 31 Stat. 848, Act of March 1, 1901, 31 Stat. 861, Act of July 1, 1902, 32 Stat. 710, Act of January 21, 1903, 32 Stat. 774, and was cited in Cabell v. V. Deceuil and Principle of Indian Lands (1982) 3 Okla. S. H. 204, 1903, Hennrich, Principle of the Indian Law and the Act of June 18, 1911 (1911), 31 Stat. 1011, 1012, 1013, 1014, 1015, 1016, 1017, 1018, 1019, 1020, 1021, 1022, 1023, 1024, 1025, 1026, for the allotment of the tribal land in severally.⁷⁵ In contrast to the General Allotment Act,⁷⁶ the legal title to the lands so allotted vested in each instance in the allottee. Exemption from taxation was provided either expressly or by restricting the allotment against alienation. The extent of the exemption in the duration of the restriction varied with each agreement.⁷⁷

A CHEROKEES

The Cherokee Allotment Act¹ provided for the selection of a homestead of value equal to 40 acres, unalienable during the lifetime of the allottee, not exceeding 21 years from the date of General in 94 Op. A. G. 275 (1924) gave the following description of the background of the allottment agreements:

Finally, by the Act of March 3, 1891 (27 Stat. 62), §§ 1, 6, 7, 15 and 19), the Commission of Five Civilized Tribes, commonly referred to as the Dawes Commission, was created to enter into negotiations with the Five Indian Nations for the purpose of extinguishing the national or tribal title to any lands in that Territory held in common by the Five Indian Nations and to divide the individual Indian or such other just and equitable method as might be agreed upon between the Indians and the United States. After three years of negotiation, the commission was indefinite period of time. (20 Nat. 319-320), the commission was directed to prepare lists of the titles as preliminary to the final report. The report was made in 1891, and, although asserting the authority of the United States over the Indian Territory, Congress announced that it is hereby declared to be the policy of the United States to establish no title in the Territory which will strip the many inequalities and disadvantages now existing in said Territory, and afford needed protection to the Indians and the white settlers. The title, therefore, and by mandatory direction to the committee be made clear is intended to be understood as not being intended to be assigned or not. All of the titles, essentially made by the Cherokee.

Under these conditions Congress passed the Act of June 24, 1896, (29 Stat. 496), which provided for the final report of the preliminary measures for allotment. The foregoing plan was followed, and the final report was made in 1897, and the report under which the titles moved on to their last long look and under which they had continued their final relations, that they were to be made final. The final report was made in 1897, and the allottees to obtain their consent to a relinquishment of the interest in the tribal property to a division in severalty.

The grant of land expressly declared non-taxable by the Cherokee Agreement extended only to the homestead. Whatever exemption from taxation the surplus enjoyed was by reason of general restrictions upon alienation.⁸⁹

B CHOCTAWS AND CHICKASAWS

The Alok Agreement, embodied in the Curtis Act,¹¹ provided for the allotment of surface rights to lands of the Cherokees and Chickasaws in Indian Territory and stated that

The Attorney General said in 11 Op. A. G. 275, 270 (1924)

The tribal lands of the Cherokees, were allotted in severally pursuant to an agreement with them as set forth in the Act of July 1, 1902 (32 Stat 776), under which (Sec 11), the members each received an allotment of land equal in value to 110 acres of the average allottable land of the tribe.

An agreement for the allotment of lands of the Cherokee ratified by Congress by Act of March 1 1901, ch Stat 848, failed of ratification by the tribe. A previous agreement concluded between the Cherokee Communitarians and the Commission to the Five Civilized Tribes on January 14, 1890, and ratified by the tribe January 31, 1890, was not ratified by Congress. *Mulh. The act further directed the issuance of patents and stated that

All the lands allotted shall be non-taxable while the title remains in the original allottee, but not to exceed twenty-one years from date of patent, and each allottee shall select from his allotment a homestead of one hundred and sixty acres, for which he shall have a separate patent, and which shall be maintainable for twenty-one years from date of patent.

The leading case of *Choate v. Trapp*¹ held that under this statute allottees acquired a vested property right to exemption from state taxation which was binding on Oklahoma and could not be impugned by subsequent congressional action without violation of the Fifth Amendment of the Federal Constitution. The exemption extends to prevent the state from imposing a tax on oil and gas royalties accruing to the Indian owner under a lease of the allotment.² The exemption does not, however, run with the land, and therefore does not attach in favor of the heirs or grantees.³

The Choctaw and Chickasaw freedmen, unlike the freedmen of the other tribes, were not members of the tribes, and their right of participation in the lands of the nations extended only to 40 acres each. The claim of the Choctaw freedmen was based upon the action of the Choctaw Nation in bestowing such right in pursuance of the treaty with the United States of 1866.⁴ The Chickasaws took no action to secure the rights of their freedmen under said treaty and allotments of 40 acres each were made to them by virtue of section 23 of the Atoka Agreement, which exempted the lands of the members of the tribes from taxation, and specified that

* * * This provision shall also apply to the Choctaw and Chickasaw freedmen to the extent of his allotment.

It has been held that the allotments of Chickasaw freedmen under the Atoka Agreement and 1902 supplemental agreement became inoperative when the Act of May 27, 1908 removed the tax exemption.⁵ In distinguishing the case of Choate v. Trapp, the court declared that the exemption enjoyed by members of the tribes could not be allocated by Congress because it had been granted in consideration of this relinquishment of some or their rights and therefore vested in the Indians a property right of which they could not be deprived under the Fifth Amendment of the Constitution, but that the freedmen had relinquished nothing and were therefore in a different position, and that by the terms of the Atoka Agreement, the rights of the freedmen remained subject to subsequent acts of Congress, and therefore the tax exemption could be removed.

The same reasoning would seem equally applicable to the Choctaw freedmen.

C CREEKS⁶

Under the Creek Agreements⁷ allotments were made inalienable for 5 years from June 30, 1902, and each citizen was allowed to

* * * select from his allotment forty acres of land, in a quarter of a quarter section, as a homestead, which was held to be the Creek's most common practice as a tribe that has also extended to in various relations of citizens, judicial opinions and administrative rulings as a continuing consisting of tribes, bands or towns. Thus in Mitchell v. United States, 9 Fed. 731 (1915) the Supreme Court upheld land titles based upon "checks from various tribes of Indians belonging to the great Creek Confederacy" (11 p. 725) and see Memo Reel I D July 16 1937, cited in Chapter 14, sec. 1. Creek "towns" which have adopted tribal constitutions are "Indianities Tribal Town" (constitution ratified December 27 1938, charter ratified April 14 1949) and Alabama (constitution Tribal Town (constitution ratified January 10 1939, charter ratified May 24 1939).

E FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES AS A GROUP

Shortly after the passage of these special allotment acts Congress began to legislate for the Five Civilized Tribes as a group.¹⁰⁰

The link between restrictions and tax exemptions is clearly demonstrated by the Act of April 26, 1906,¹⁰ providing for the

Also see 49 F. 11 345 (1922), and 58 F. 11 48 (1920), which states, among other things,

B) Inter legislation as found in the acts of April 26, 1906, (1 Stat. 1375) and May 27, 1908 (35 Stat. 1123). Congress set up a new and uniform set of restrictions applicable alike to all of the Five Civilized Tribes. Without discussing the provisions of this later legislation in detail it is sufficient for present purposes to point out that the restriction against abduction of lands, all rights of hunting and fishing, and the right to take game and fowl and their carcasses and bloods, and therefore removed is in no way as prior law was continued to April 26, 1904 and the restrictions as to certain other lands were removed with the provisions which have already been mentioned. The provisions of the Statute of 1906 would therefore become subject to taxation in the State (1906, p. 90).

Other statutes dealing with allotments of the Five Civilized Tribes include

The Act of May 26, 1020, 41 Stat. 625, as amended by Act of January 7, 1925, 48 Stat. 723, empowered the Secretary of the Interior to pay out of any funds of the Creek, Cherokee, Choctaw, Chickasaw, and Seminole Nations, part of the cost of town improvements. The 1920 Act amended the Act of June 30 1013, 38 Stat. 77. 96

For an example of a provision found in many appropriation statutes, see Act of February 14, 1920, §§ 18, 11 Stat 408, 428.

Some provisions applied to all the Five Civilized Tribes, but the Seminoles. See, for example, the Appropriation Act of May 31, 1900, § 1, Stat. 221, 236-238. For regulations relating to removal of restrictions and sale of lands of members of the Five Civilized Tribes and reinvestment of funds in nontaxable lands, see 25 C. F. R. 241.34-241.48.

This section contained a proviso that as to allotments of Indians of one-half or more Indian blood who died leaving issue born since March 4, 1900, the homestead should remain unalienable for the life of the issue or until April 20, 1931, under removal of restrictions should be sooner authorized by the Secretary of the Interior.¹²⁰ By the Act of May 10, 1928,¹²¹ restrictions on alienation of allotments of allottees of half blood or more were extended until April 20, 1936. The Act of May 21, 1928,¹²² amending section 4 of the Act of May 10, 1928, limited the tax exemption to 100 acres of land to be selected by the Indian, who shall receive a certificate designating it.¹²³ The exemption was to continue so long as the title remained in the Indian designated or in any full-blood heir or devisee of the land. The May 10, 1928 Act also contained a provision that nothing in the act upon his death and the descent of the title to his minor heirs of less than half Indian blood. The fact of minority of the heir does not seem to contravene the restriction and therefore the tax exemption is removed by this section. McNee v. Whitehead, 253 Fed. 649 (C. C. A. 8, 1918). Cf. Wynn v. Fugate, Olla, 200 Tex. 800 (1911).

¹²¹ See 1, 43 Stat. 403, supra, fn. 106. It was provided that the Secretary of the Interior may remove the restrictions upon applications of the Indian owners, in whole or in part, under such rules and regulations as he shall prescribe. Prior to April 20, 1931, allotted lands held by the original allottees, and allotted lands acquired by full-blood Indians through devise or inheritance from an allottee and held by the heir or devisee were nonalienable. See sec. 4, Act of May 27, 1908, 35 Stat. 313, supra, fn. 102. United States v. Lee, 21 F. Supp. 814 (D. C. E. D. Okla., 1938), aff'd 108 F. 2d 930 (C. C. A. 10, 1939). Contra, Wynn v. Fugate, supra. On the death of the allottee, allotted lands, except those passing by devise or inheritance to full-blood Indian heirs, became subject to taxation. United States v. Sherck, 187 Fed. 870, 872, 873 (C. C. B. D. Okla., 1911).

"* * * That all minerals, including oil and gas, produced on or after April 20, 1931, from restricted allotted lands of members of the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma, or from unallotted restricted lands of full-blood Indian heirs or devisees of such lands, shall be subject to all State and Federal taxes of every kind and character the same as those produced from lands owned by other citizens of the State of Oklahoma, and the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to cause to be paid, from the individual Indian funds held under his supervision and control and belonging to the Indian owners of the lands, the taxes to be assessed against the property and interest of the respective Indian owners in such oil, gas, and should be construed to exempt from taxation any lands subject to taxation under existing law."¹²⁴

The first intention of the swing in policy toward expansion of exemptions is found in the Act of March 4, 1904,¹²⁵ providing that where notable land of a restricted Indian of the Five Civilized Tribes is sold under existing law, the Secretary of the Interior may reinvest the proceeds in other land, which will be nonalienable and restricted from alienation. Under the Act of June 30, 1932,¹²⁶ it was provided that the restrictions should appear in the deed.

The Act of January 27, 1933,¹²⁷ provided that "* * * where the entire interest in any tract of restricted and tax-exempt land belonging to members of the Five Civilized Tribes is, acquired by inheritance, devise, gift, or purchase, with restricted funds, by or for restricted Indians, such lands shall remain restricted and tax-exempt during the life of and as long as held by such restricted Indians, but not longer than April 20, 1936, unless restrictions are removed in the meantime in the manner provided by law.

The act also provided

"That such restricted and tax-exempt land held by anyone, acquired as herein provided, shall not exceed one hundred and sixty acres. And provided further, That all minerals including oil and gas, produced from said land so acquired shall be subject to all State and Federal taxes as provided in section 3 of the Act approved May 10, 1928 (45 Stat. L. 405).

other mineral production. Provided, That nothing in this Act shall be construed to impose or provide for double taxation and, in those cases where the owner is a restricted Indian, that all minerals including oil and gas, produced from restricted Indian lands are subject to the ad valorem tax of the State of Oklahoma for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1931, the gross production tax which is in lieu thereof shall not be imposed prior to July 1, 1931. Provided further, That in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, the tax or taxes due the State of Oklahoma may be paid in the manner provided by the Statute of the State of Oklahoma.

Ct. 130, the court held that this act was intended to restrict lands of half bloods or more acquired by inheritance, and hence the one-third interest in an Indian homestead allotment which a seven-eighths blood Choctaw Indian had inherited, and mortgage and deeds executed by a Choctaw Indian without approval of the Secretary of the Interior or the Oklahoma County court were invalid.

SECTION 9. LEASING OF ALLOTTED LANDS OF FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES

Some of the allotment agreements permitted allottees to lease their allotments for specified purposes and periods.¹²⁸ Section 19 of the Act of April 28, 1900,¹²⁹ in extending for 25 years the restrictions upon alienation by full-blooded allottees, provided that such allottees might lease any lands other than homesteads for more than one year under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior, "and in case of the inability of any full-blood owner of a homestead, on account of infirmity or age, to work or farm his homestead, the Secretary of the Interior, upon proof of such inability, may authorize the leasing of such homestead under such rules and regulations." Section 20 required all leases and rental contracts of full-blood allottees to be in writing and approved by the Secretary of the Interior, except (1) if for not exceeding a year for agricultural purposes, for lands other than homesteads; (2) the proper court might rent or lease allotments of minors or incompetents. All leases for a period exceeding a year were required to be recorded in conformity to the law of the Indian Territory.

Section 2 of the Act of May 27, 1908,¹³⁰ provided:

"* * * That all lands other than homesteads allotted to members of the Five Civilized Tribes from which restrictions have not been removed may be leased by the allottee if an adult, or by guardian or curator under order of the proper probate court if a minor or incompetent, for a period not to exceed five years, without the privilege of

For a discussion of its interpretation see Bledsoe, op. cit., pp. 241-245. By sec. 6, leases of restricted lands in violation of the law before or after approval of this act were null and void. For regulations relating to leasing of restricted lands for mining, see 35 C. T. R. 180.1-183.40.

renewal. Provided, That leases of restricted lands for oil, gas, or other mining purposes, leases of restricted homesteads for more than one year, and leases of restricted lands for periods of more than five years, may be made, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, under rules and regulations provided by the Secretary of the Interior, and not otherwise. And provided further, That the jurisdiction of the probate courts of the State of Oklahoma over lands of minors and incompetents shall be subject to the foregoing provisions, and the term minor or minors, as used in this Act, shall include all males under the age of twenty-one years and all females under the age of eighteen years.

Section 15 of the Act of February 14, 1930,¹²¹ authorized the Superintendent for the Five Civilized Tribes to approve, reject, or disapprove all uncontested leases (except oil and gas leases) but permitted an aggrieved party the right to appeal from the decision of the Superintendent to the Secretary of the Interior within 90 days from the date of the decision.

Changes in laws relating to alienation have created many problems in the field of leasing. For example section 1 of the Act of January 27, 1938,¹²² quoted at the end of the preceding section, affects leases as well as sales.

The effect of this provision on leases was thus analyzed by the Solicitor of the Department of the Interior:¹²³

In my opinion of March 14, 1934 (51 I. D. 892), it was held that the foregoing provision was not retroactive and applied only to acquisitions after the date of the enactment. Accordingly, the status of lands acquired by inheritance, devise, etc., prior to that enactment is determined by the laws then in force. Under those laws, which it is unnecessary to detail, the death of an allottee terminated all restrictions if the heirs or devisees were less than the full-blood, but if the lands passed to full-bloods the restrictions were relaxed to permit conveyances by the heirs with the approval of the county court having jurisdiction of the settlement of the deceased allottee's estate. Accordingly, lands acquired prior to January 27, 1938, by Indians of less than full-blood, whether such lands were restricted and tax exempt or restricted and taxable, passed to them free from all restrictions. Such lands, therefore, are subject to sale or lease without the approval of the Secretary of the Interior or the county court, unless, of course, some disability rested upon the owner under the State law. If, however, the heirs or devisees are of the full-blood, any conveyance of their interests on an oil and gas lease thereof must not only receive the approval of the county court having jurisdiction of the settlement of the deceased allottee's estate (section 8 of the act of May 27, 1908, 35 Stat. 312, as amended by the act of April 12, 1926, 44 Stat. 280, United States v. Gypsy Oil case, 10 Fed. (2d) 487), but such approval must be given in open court after notice in accordance with the rules of procedure in probate matters adopted by the Supreme Court of Oklahoma in June 1934 (section 8, act of January 27, 1938). The rules just stated apply also to lands acquired after January 27, 1938, unless such lands are both restricted and tax exempt and the entire interest therein is acquired by a restricted Indian or restricted Indians.

The first proviso of section 1 of the act of January 27, 1938, is without application unless the lands involved are both restricted and tax exempt and unless the entire interest therein is acquired by restricted Indians. The language immediately preceding the first proviso shows that the term "restricted Indians" was intended to embrace Indians of the Five Civilized Tribes of one-half or more Indian blood. In my opinion of March 14, 1934, it was pointed out that the lands to which the first proviso of the act of 1938 applied fall into two classes, first, restricted allotments of living allottees which have been designated by them as tax exempt under the act of May 10, 1928 (48 Stat. 406), which lands were under the juris-isdiction of the Secretary of the Interior and could be leased for oil and gas mining purposes only with his approval and not otherwise under section 2 of the act of May 27, 1908, supra. Second, lands inherited by or devised to full-blood Indians prior to January 27, 1938, and designated by them as tax exempt under the act of 1928, which lands were subject to the restriction that no conveyance in the full-blood should be valid unless approved by the county court having jurisdiction of the settlement of the deceased allottee's estate, and which lands could be leased by the full-blood for oil and gas mining purposes with the approval of the said court and without the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

It was further pointed out in my opinion of March 11 that the first proviso of the act of 1933 was designed to preserve the existing restrictions and not to impose restrictions once removed or to change the form of existing restrictions. Accordingly, where the entire interest in lands of the first class is acquired by Indians of the Five Civilized Tribes of one-half or more Indian blood, they take the same subject to the same restrictions which rested upon the lands of the allottee. Such lands, therefore, continue to be subject to lease for oil and gas mining purposes only with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and not otherwise. The county court having jurisdiction of the settlement of the deceased allottee's estate has no authority to approve a conveyance or lease of such lands. The only jurisdiction which the probate courts may exercise in this class of cases is confined to conveyances and leases made by guardians of minors and incompetents, and in such cases the conveyance or lease must be made under order of the proper probate court. See sections 3 and 6 of the act of May 27, 1908, supra.

Where the entire interest in lands of the second class—that is, tax-exempt lands acquired by full-blood heirs or devisees prior to January 27, 1938—passes into the hands of Indians of one-half or more Indian blood after that date, such Indians take the lands subject to the restriction resting upon the previous owner, namely, they cannot convey without the approval of the county court having jurisdiction of the settlement of the deceased allottee's estate. With such approval they may convey or lease, but such approval as to the interest of any full-blood must be given in open court after notice, as provided by section 8 of the act of January 27, 1938.

The Act of February 11, 1930,¹²⁴ provided that leases of restricted lands on behalf of minors and Indians non compos mentis of the Five Civilized Tribes may be made, for periods not exceeding 5 years for farming and grazing purposes, by the superintendent or other official in charge of the Five Civilized Tribes Agency, and empowered other Indians to make such leases, subject to the approval of such official.¹²⁵

Several questions arising under this act have been recently discussed by the Solicitor of the Department of the Interior:¹²⁶

A Do farming and grazing leases require approval by this office—

- (1) Where the allottee died prior to January 27, 1938?
- (2) Where any heir is less than half blood and the other heirs are one-half blood or more?
- (3) Where the land is not tax exempt?

B Do farming and grazing leases by full-blood adult heirs require approval by the County Court or by this office?

* * * the foregoing act applies to restricted lands belonging to Indians of the Five Civilized Tribes of one-half or more Indian blood. Ownership by an Indian one-half or more Indian blood is not sufficient to bring the case within the statute. The lands must also be restricted.

have for the requirement that the Superintendent must approve all leases of restricted lands belonging to Indians of the degree of blood mentioned, the act makes no change in the prior laws dealing with the restrictions on lands of Indians of the Five Civilized Tribes and we must look to those laws for the purpose of ascertaining whether the lands in any particular case are or are not restricted.

The act of January 27, 1933 (47 Stat. 777), will be first considered. That act is confined to the restrictions on restricted and tax-exempt lands inherited by restricted Indians; that is, Indians of one-half or more Indian blood. That act has no application to lands or interests therein inherited prior to the date of the enactment. Solicitor's Opinion of March 14, 1934 (54 I. D. 282). It is further without application unless (a) the lands are both restricted and tax-exempt, and (b) the entire interest is inherited by Indians of one-half or more Indian blood. Questions A (1), (2), and (8) all deal with cases to which the act of January 27, 1933, has no application and the question of whether the inherited interest is determined by the laws in force prior to January 27, 1933. Under section 6 of the act of May 27, 1908 (35 Stat. 312), as amended April 12, 1920 (43 Stat. 405), the death of an allottee of the Five Civilized Tribes removed all restrictions against alienation except where the heirs are of the full-blood and as to such full-blood heirs the restrictions are not removed but relaxed to the extent of sanctioning conveyances made with the approval of the proper county court. As the county court in approving such conveyances acts as a Federal agency, the inherited interest of the full-blood heir remained restricted. Palmer v. Richard (250 U. S. 235). Accordingly, questions A (1), (2), and (8) may be answered by stating that where the heir is a full-blood, a lease of his inherited interest under the act of February 11, 1936, requires the approval of the Superintendent. Interests inherited by heirs of less than the full-blood are unrestricted and may be leased without approval.

Answering question B it may be said that lands inherited by a full-blood heir prior to January 27, 1933, or in any case to which the act of January 27, 1933, has no application, are restricted in the sense that a Federal agent, the county court, must approve the conveyance. If the entire interest in a tract of restricted and tax-exempt land is inherited by an Indian or Indians of one-half or more Indian blood after January 27, 1933, the existing restrictions are preserved by the act of that date. Solicitor's Opinion of March 14, 1934, supra. It is immaterial whether the approving agency is the county court or the Secretary of the Interior, as in either case the inherited interest is restricted and a farming and grazing lease thereon to be valid must, under the act of February 11, 1936, supra, receive the approval of the Superintendent.

SECTION 10. TRUSTS OF RESTRICTED FUNDS OF MEMBERS OF FIVE TRIBES

The Act of January 27, 1933,¹²⁸ provided that all funds and other securities held under the supervision of the Secretary of the Interior belonging to Indians of the Five Civilized Tribes in Oklahoma of one-half or more Indian blood, unimproved or unimproved, shall be restricted and shall remain under the jurisdiction of the Secretary until April 20, 1950, "subject to expenditure in the meantime for the use and benefit of the individual Indians" who own them, under rules and regulations prescribed by the Secretary.

The Secretary was empowered¹²⁹ to permit any adult Indian of the Five Civilized Tribes to create and establish out of restricted funds or other property under the Secretary's supervision, trusts for a maximum period of 21 years after the death of the last survivor of the named beneficiaries in the respective trust period, for the benefit of such Indian, his heirs or other designated beneficiaries, by contracts or agreements between the Indian and incorporated trust companies or banks.

No trust company or bank may act as a trustee in any trust created under this act "which has paid or promised to pay to any person other than an officer or employee on the regular pay roll thereof any charge, fee, commission, or remuneration for any service or influence in securing or attempting to secure for it the trusteeship in any trust." Trust agreements or contracts made prior to January 27, 1933, the date of this law's approval, and not approved prior to such enactment by the Secretary of the Interior, are declared void.¹³⁰

The Secretary is authorized to transfer the funds or property required by the terms of an approved trust agreement to the trustee,¹³¹ which must keep these assets segregated from all other assets.

None of the restrictions upon the corpus under the terms of the trust agreement may be released during the restrictive period, except as provided by such agreement, and neither the corpus and trust nor the income derived therefrom, during the restrictive period, provided by law, is alienable.¹³²

The trustee is to render an annual accounting to the Secretary and the beneficiary.¹³³

Such trust agreements are irrevocable except with the Secretary's consent.¹³⁴ If a trust agreement is annulled, the corpus of the trust estate with all accrued and unpaid interest must be returned to the Secretary as restricted individual Indian property.

Illegally procured trusts are to be cancelled by proceedings instituted by the Attorney General in the federal courts.¹³⁵

SECTION 11. INHERITANCE AMONG FIVE CIVILIZED TRIBES¹³⁷

A. INTESTATE SUCCESSION

Among the Five Civilized Tribes, as among all other tribes, tribal law governs descent in the absence of congressional legislation.¹³⁸ The General Allotment Act¹³⁹ did not apply to the Five Civilized Tribes, and so its provisions on inheritance have no application to these tribes.

Sec. 52 Where deeds to tribal lands in the Five Civilized Tribes have been or may be used, in pursuance of any tribal agreement or Act of Congress, to a person who had died, or who hereafter dies before the approval of such deed, the title to the land designated therein shall inure to and become vested in the heirs, devisees, or assigns of such deceased grantee as if the deed had inured to the deceased grantee during his life.

¹³⁸ See Chapter 7, sec. 6.

¹³⁹ Act of February 8, 1887, 24 Stat. 388.

The Supreme Court in the case of Telford v. Pink,¹³⁰ summarized the early congressional legislation regarding descent and distribution as follows:

By its passed in 1800, 1804, 1807 and 1808, Congress manifested its purpose to allot or divide in severalty the lands of the Five Civilized Tribes with a view to the ultimate creation of a State embracing the Indian Territory, put in force in the Territory several statutes of Arkansas, including Chapter 49 of Mansfield's Digest relating to descent and distribution, provided that these statutes should apply to all persons in the Territory, irrespective of race, and substantially amended the law of the several tribes, including those relating to descent and distribution. Acts May 2, 1800, c. 182; 26 Stat. 81 § 31, March 3, 1803, c. 200, 27 Stat. 671, § 16; June 7, 1807, c. 4, 30 Stat. 83, June 28, 1808, c. 577, 40 Stat. 435 § 411 and 20. This was the situation when the Act of 1801, known as the Original Creek Agreement, was adopted. That act in the course of providing for the allotment in severalty of the lands of the Creeks, revised their tribal law of descent and distribution by making it applicable to their allotments, §§ 7 and 23. But the revision was only temporary, for the Act of 1802, known as the Supplemental Creek Agreement, not only repealed so much of the Act of 1801 as gave effect to the tribal law but reinstated the Arkansas law with the qualification that Creek heirs, if there were such, should take to the exclusion of others.¹³¹ Washington v. Miller, 235 U.S. 422, 425-426. The allotment in question was made in 1803, and the tribal deeds issued shortly after the Act of 1801 became effective. And this was followed by the Act of April 28, 1804, c. 1824, 38 Stat. 573, § 2, declaring that all statutes of Arkansas then in force put in force in the Indian Territory should apply "to embrace all persons and estates in said Territory, whether Indian, freedmen or otherwise" (Pp. 201-202).

The repealing and reinstating portion of the act was as follows:

"§ The provisions of the act of Congress approved March 1, 1801 (21 Stat. L. 561), in so far as they provide for descent and distribution according to the laws of the Creek Nation, are hereby repealed and the descent and distribution of land and money payable by or said act shall be in accordance with chapter 49 of Mansfield's Digest of the Statutes of Arkansas now in force in Indian Territory. Provided, That only citizens of the Creek Nation male and female, and their Creek descendants shall inherit lands of the Creek Nation. And provided further, That if there be no person of Creek citizenship to take the descent and distribution of said estate, then the inheritance shall go to noncitizens heirs in the order named in said chapter 49."

There was a like provision but without the proviso, in the Act of May 27, 1804, c. 200.

Referring to the purpose with which the Arkansas statutes were put in force in that Territory and to their statutes there, this court said in Shultis v. McDowell, 225 U.S. 551, 571: "Congress was then contemplating the early inclusion of that Territory in a new State, and the purpose of those acts was to provide, for the time being, a body of laws adapted to the needs of the locality and its people in respect of matters of local or domestic concern. There being no local legislature, Congress alone could act. Plainly, its action was intended to be merely provisional."

By the enabling act of June 16, 1906, c. 8385, § 4 Stat. 207, provision was made for admitting into the Union both the Territory of Oklahoma and the Indian Territory as the State of Oklahoma. Each Territory had a distinct body of local laws. Those in the Indian Territory, as we have seen, had been put in force there by Congress. Those in the Territory of Oklahoma had been enacted by the territorial legislature. Deeming it better that the new State should come into the Union with a body of laws applying with practical uniformity throughout the State, Congress provided in the enabling act (§ 13) that "the laws in force in the Territory of Oklahoma, as far as applicable, shall extend over and apply to said State until changed by the legislature thereof" and also (§ 21) that "all laws in force in the Territory of Oklahoma at the time of the admission of said State into the Union shall be in force throughout said State, except as modified or changed by this act or by the constitution of the State." The people of the State, I think the same way, provided in their constitution (Art. 25, § 2) that "all laws in force in the Territory of Oklahoma at the time of the admission of the State into the Union, which are not repugnant to this Constitution, and which are not locally inapplicable, shall be extended to and remain in force in the State or Oklahoma until they expire by their own limitation or are altered or repealed by law."

The State was admitted into the Union November 16, 1907, and thereupon the laws of the Territory of Oklahoma relating to descent and distribution (Rev. Stat. Okla. 1903, c. 38, Art. 1) became laws of the State. Thereafter Congress, by the Act of May 27, 1908, c. 100, §§ Stat. 312, § 9, recognized and located "the laws of descent and distribution of the State of Oklahoma" as applicable to the lands allotted to members of the Five Civilized Tribes (Pp. 202-203.)

B WILLS

Section 23 of the Act of April 20, 1906¹³² provided for the making of wills, but invalidated a will of a full-blood Indian which disinherited the parent, wife, spouse, or children, unless acknowledged before and approved by a judge of the United States Court for the Indian Territory or a United States Commissioner.¹³³ In Blundell v. Wallace,¹³⁴ the Supreme Court said in interpreting this section:

"... 4. The general policy of Congress prior to the adoption of § 23, plainly had been to consider the local law of descents and wills applicable to the persons and estates of Indians except in so far as it was otherwise provided. Thus, by § 2 of the Act of April 28, 1804, c. 1824, 38 Stat. 573, the laws of Arkansas, theretofore put in force in the Indian Territory, were expressly "continued and extended in their operation, so as to embrace all persons and estates in said Territory, whether Indian, freedmen, or otherwise," and jurisdiction was conferred upon the courts of the Territory in the settlement of the estates of decedents, etc., whether Indian, freedmen, or otherwise. Section 23 must be read in the light of this policy, and, so reading it, we agree with the ruling of the same supreme court that Congress intended thereby to enable "the Indian to dispose of his estate on the same footing as any other citizen, with the limitation contained in the proviso thereto." The effect of § 23 was to remove a restriction theretofore existing upon the testamentary power of the Indians, leaving the regulatory local law free to operate as in the case of other persons and property" (P. 876).

C PROBATE JURISDICTION

The Act of May 27, 1908,¹³⁵ was enacted at the request of the Oklahoma delegation, as part of the plan for removal of restrictions from Indian lands of the Five Civilized Tribes.¹³⁶ Section 6 conferred jurisdiction upon the probate (county) courts of the State of Oklahoma over the estates of Indian minors and incompetents of the Five Civilized Tribes.¹³⁷ The probate court was ¹³⁰ 34 Stat. 187, supra fn. 101.

¹³¹ Amended by Act May 27, 1908, sec. 8, 35 Stat. 812, 315, to include "in a judge of a county court of the State of Oklahoma."

¹³² 297 U.S. 578 (1925).

¹³³ 35 Stat. 812, supra, fn. 102. The Act of April 28, 1804, sec. 2, 38 Stat. 573, conferred jurisdiction upon the district court to settle estates of decedents and the guardianship of minors and incompetents, whether Indians, freedmen, or otherwise. See Stacy v. Parker, 225 U.S. 42 (1914).

¹³⁴ By sec. 22 of the Act of April 20, 1906, 34 Stat. 187, 145, adult heirs of a deceased allottee of the Five Civilized Tribes were permitted to sell and convey lands inherited from the decedent, and minor heirs were permitted to join in the sale of such inherited lands by a guardian appointed by the appropriate court for the Indian Territory.

also given, by section 9, authority to approve conveyances by full-blood heirs.¹²⁷

Provisions were also made for the appointment of probate attorneys by the Secretary of the Interior, with prescribed duties relating to restricted lands.

Section 8 of the Act of January 27, 1938,¹²⁸ makes it the duty of these probate attorneys to appear and represent any restricted member of the Five Civilized Tribes before the county courts or in the appellate courts.¹²⁹

Section 1 of the act of June 11, 1918,¹³⁰ vested in the state courts jurisdiction to probate wills and determine heirs in accordance with state laws of any deceased citizen allottee of the Five Civilized Tribes who died leaving restricted heirs. However, to the extent that creditors, attorneys, and personal representatives must depend on restricted property and funds for payment of fees and claims, the Secretary of the Interior retained sole jurisdiction to pass upon the reasonableness of their claims.

D. PARTITION

Section 2 of this law¹³¹ also made the "lands of full-blood members of any of the Five Civilized Tribes" subject to the laws of the State of Oklahoma providing for the partition of real estate.

If the owner lands that an equitable partition is impossible, it may order the sale of the land and the division of the proceeds among the heirs.¹³²

This provision has been interpreted as follows:¹³³

" * * * The wide sweep of the language contained in the statute [see 2, Act of June 14, 1918, supra] expressly subjecting the lands of full-blood Indians to the laws of the state for partition fails to indicate a legislative purpose to limit the grant or extent of jurisdiction to district courts in proceedings affecting lands of living Indians, to the exclusion of proceedings in the county court in the administration and settlement of estates of deceased full-bloods. (P 507.)

" * * * It [see 1, Act of January 27, 1938, 47 Stat. 777] does not narrow that part of the Act of 1918, supra, which consents to the making of the lands of full-blood members of the Five Civilized Tribes, subject to the laws of the State of Oklahoma relating to the partition of real estate. Instead, it provides that the restrictions there imposed upon restricted and tax-exempt land belonging to a member of such tribes which is acquired by or for restricted Indians by inheritance, gift, or purchase with restricted funds, shall remain restricted during the period fixed therein, unless the restrictions are removed in the meantime in the manner provided by law. At least two separate and distinct methods existed at that time for the removal of restrictions against alienation. One was by the Secretary of the Interior, and the other was by partition and sale in the county court in the course of the administration and settlement of the estate of a deceased full-blood Indian. The concluding language in the proviso is plainly broad enough to include both. (P 508.)

"28 U S C 885. It also provided that any land allotted in partition proceedings to a full-blood Indian, or conveyed to him upon his election to take the same at the appraisement, shall remain subject to all restrictions upon alienation and taxation obtaining prior to such partition, but "in case of a sale under any decree, or partition, the conveyance thereunder shall operate to relieve the lands described of all restrictions of every character."

"For discussion of restricted state of proceeds from a partition sale, see Chapter 10, sec 8.

SECTION 12. SPECIAL LAWS GOVERNING OSAGE TRIBE¹³⁴

The special laws governing the Osage Tribe and the decisions applying and construing them are of a complexity and volume that preclude any detailed treatment in this work.

"For a history of the Osages see United States v. Aaron, 133 Fed. 847 (C C W. D. Okla., 1910); Lobnitz v. United States, 6 Okla. 400, 31 Pac 606 (1897). The Osage lands were purchased by the United States pursuant to Art. 16 of the Treaty of July 19, 1806, 14 Stat. 709, 804, in which the Cherokee Indians in the Indian Territory agreed that the United States might purchase part of their lands for the purpose of settling friendly Indians thereon.

Many special statutes were enacted concerning the lands of the Osage Nation in Kansas. The following statutes concern the sale of Osage Indian lands in that state: Act of May 9, 1872, 17 Stat. 60, R. S. §§ 2388, 2389, 2390, 2391, 2392, 2393, 2394, 2395, 2396, 2397, 2398, 2399, 2400, 2401, 2402, 2403, 2404, 2405, 2406, 2407, 2408, 2409, 2410, 2411, 2412, 2413, 2414, 2415, 2416, 2417, 2418, 2419, 2420, 2421, 2422, 2423, 2424, 2425, 2426, 2427, 2428, 2429, 2430, 2431, 2432, 2433, 2434, 2435, 2436, 2437, 2438, 2439, 2440, 2441, 2442, 2443, 2444, 2445, 2446, 2447, 2448, 2449, 2450, 2451, 2452, 2453, 2454, 2455, 2456, 2457, 2458, 2459, 2460, 2461, 2462, 2463, 2464, 2465, 2466, 2467, 2468, 2469, 2470, 2471, 2472, 2473, 2474, 2475, 2476, 2477, 2478, 2479, 2480, 2481, 2482, 2483, 2484, 2485, 2486, 2487, 2488, 2489, 2490, 2491, 2492, 2493, 2494, 2495, 2496, 2497, 2498, 2499, 2500, 2501, 2502, 2503, 2504, 2505, 2506, 2507, 2508, 2509, 2510, 2511, 2512, 2513, 2514, 2515, 2516, 2517, 2518, 2519, 2520, 2521, 2522, 2523, 2524, 2525, 2526, 2527, 2528, 2529, 2530, 2531, 2532, 2533, 2534, 2535, 2536, 2537, 2538, 2539, 2540, 2541, 2542, 2543, 2544, 2545, 2546, 2547, 2548, 2549, 2550, 2551, 2552, 2553, 2554, 2555, 2556, 2557, 2558, 2559, 2560, 2561, 2562, 2563, 2564, 2565, 2566, 2567, 2568, 2569, 2570, 2571, 2572, 2573, 2574, 2575, 2576, 2577, 2578, 2579, 2580, 2581, 2582, 2583, 2584, That the allottees of the Osage Nation may change the present designation of homesteads to an equal area of their unencumbered surplus lands, upon application to, and under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the Interior may prescribe; provided, that in each transaction the change of designation shall take the status of the other as it existed prior to the change in designation as to alienation, taxation, or otherwise, and that any order of change of designation shall be recorded in the proper office of

The lands other than homestead were made unalienable¹²⁷ for 25 years, except that in his discretion the Secretary of the Interior, at the request of an adult member, might issue a certificate of competency authorizing him to sell any of the land, except the homestead, which was to remain unalienable and non-taxable for a period of 25 years, or during the life of the homestead allottee. Upon the issuance of the certificate of competency the surplus lands became alienable and subject to taxation.¹²⁸ Subdivision 7 of section 2 of this statute also provided

That the surplus lands shall be non-taxable for the period of three years from the approval of this Act, except where certificates of competency are issued or in case of the death of the allottee.¹²⁹

The Act of March 8, 1900,¹³⁰ authorized and empowered the Secretary of the Interior, upon application, to sell, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by him, part or all of the surplus lands of any member of the Osage Tribe. This Act provided that such sales should be subject to the reserved rights of the tribe in oil, gas, and other minerals.

The Act of April 18, 1912,¹³¹ section 3, conferred jurisdiction on the county courts of the State of Oklahoma in probate matters affecting the property of deceased and of orphan minor, insane, or other incompetent allottees of the Osage Tribe, with Osage County. Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby authorized when the same would be for the best interest of Osage allottees, to permit the sale of surplus and homestead allotments, wholly or in part, of Osage allottees under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe and upon such terms, as he shall approve.

¹²⁷ A distinction is drawn here between alienability and taxability. It is to be noted that although the surplus lands were made inalienable for 25 years, they were exempted from taxation for only 3 years. The homestead, however, was made both inalienable and non-taxable for 25 years. United States v. Board of Comm'rs of Osage County, 216 Fed. 858 (C. C. A. 10, 1914).

¹²⁸ United States v. Board of Comm'rs. of Osage County, 216 Fed. 858 (C. C. A. 10, 1914).

the provision that no land should be sold or alienated under that section without the approval of the Secretary of the Interior. Section 6 conferred jurisdiction on the courts of Oklahoma to partition Osage allotted lands but provided that no partition or sale of the restricted lands of a deceased Osage allottee should be valid until approved by the Secretary of the Interior. It also removed the restrictions from lands held by heirs having certificates of competency or who were nonmembers of the tribe. Section 7 secured the lands allotted to members of the tribe against any lien for any debt or obligation contracted or incurred prior to the issuance of a certificate of competency, or removal of restrictions on alienation. It also provided that no lands or moneys inherited from Osage allottees shall be subject to, or be taken or sold to secure the payment of, any indebtedness incurred by such heirs prior to the time such lands and moneys are turned over to them. Section 8 of the act authorized the disposition by will by any adult member of the Osage Tribe of his estate, real, personal, or mixed, including trust funds, from which restrictions on alienation had been removed, in accordance with the laws of the State of Oklahoma, except that no such will should be admitted to probate or have any validity unless approved before or after the death of the testator by the Secretary of the Interior.

The Appropriation Act of May 25, 1918,¹³² authorized Osage allottees in accordance with regulations of the Secretary of the Interior, to change the present designation of homesteads to an equal area of their unencumbered surplus lands, each tract, after the change of designation, to take the status of the other as it existed prior to such change as to alienation, taxation, or otherwise. This act also authorized the Secretary of the Interior, where it would be for the best interest of the Osage allottees, to permit the sale of homestead and surplus allotments, wholly or in part, under regulations to be prescribed by him.

The Act of March 8, 1921,¹³³ amending the 1906 act,¹³⁴ declared the Osage citizens of the United States and removed of Indians, the members thereof, or their heirs and assigns, were continued subject to such trust and supervision until January 1, 1900, unless otherwise provided by act of Congress. This act also provided that homestead allotments of Osage Indians not having a certificate of competency shall remain exempt from taxation while the title remains in the original allottee of one-half or more of Osage Indian blood and in his unallotted heirs or devisees of one-half or more of Osage Indian blood until January 1, 1900, with the proviso that the tax-exempt land of any such Indian allottee, heir, or devisee shall not at any time exceed 160 acres.

Section 5 of this Act provides:

The restrictions concerning lands and funds of allotted Osage Indians, as provided in this Act and all prior Acts now in force, shall apply to unallotted Osage Indians born since July 1, 1907, or after the passage of this Act, and to their heirs of Osage Indian blood, except that the provisions of section 6 of the Act of Congress approved February 27, 1903, with reference to the validity of contracts for debt, shall not apply to any allotted or unallotted Osage Indian of less than one-half degree Indian blood. Provided, That the Osage lands and funds and other property which has heretofore or which may hereafter be held in trust or under supervision of the United States for such Osage Indians of less than one-half degree Indian blood not having a certificate of competency shall not be subject to forced sale to satisfy any debt or obligation contracted or incurred prior to the issuance of a certificate of competency. Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized in his discretion to grant a certificate of competency to any unallotted Osage Indian when in the judgment of the said Secretary such member is fully competent and capable of transacting his or her own affairs.

The Act of June 24, 1898,¹²² continued the restrictions on the lands, moneys, and other properties now or hereafter held in trust or under the supervision of the United States for Osage Indians, until January 1, 1904, unless otherwise provided by act of Congress. This act also continued the tax exemption on homestead allotments of Osage Indians not having a certificate of competency, while the title remains in the original allottee of one-half or more of Osage Indian blood or in his unallotted heirs or devisees of one-half or more Osage Indian blood, until January 1, 1891.

No general exemption of Osage Indians as such from the payment of taxes can be implied from these statutes. On the contrary, the plan has been to teach the Indians, by partial taxation, to assume the responsibilities of citizenship.¹²³

B. HEADRIGHTS AND COMPETENCY

Section 4 of the Act of June 28, 1906 provides, in part:

That all funds belonging to the Osage tribe, and all moneys due, and all moneys that may become due, or may hereafter be found to be due the said Osage tribe of Indians, shall be held in trust by the United States for the period of twenty-five years from and after the first day of January, nineteen hundred and seven, except as herein provided:

Code (Act of August 25, 1907, 35 Stat. 806) provides: "Whenever restricted Indian lands in the State of Oklahoma are subject to gross production tax on minerals, including oil and gas, the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, may cause such tax or taxes due the State of Oklahoma to be paid in the manner provided for by the statute of the State of Oklahoma."

First That all the funds of the Osage tribe of Indians, and all the moneys now due or that may hereafter be found to be due to the said Osage tribe of Indians, and all moneys that may be received from the sale of their lands in Kansas under existing laws, and all moneys found to be due to said Osage tribe of Indians on claims against the United States, after all proper expenses are paid, shall be segregated as soon after January first, nineteen hundred and seven, as is practicable and placed to the credit of the individual members of the said Osage tribe on a basis of a pro rata division among the members of said tribe, as shown by the authorized roll of membership as herein provided for, or to their heirs as hereinafter provided, said credit to draw interest as now authorized by law, and the interest that may accrue thereon shall be paid quarterly to the members entitled thereto, except in the case of minors, in which case the interest shall be paid quarterly to the parents until said minor arrives at the age of twenty-one years. Provided, That if the Commissioner of Indian Affairs becomes satisfied that the said interest of any minor is being misused or squandered he may withhold the payment of such interest and provided further, That said interest of minors whose parents are deceased shall be paid to their legal guardians, as above provided.

Second That the royalty received from oil, gas, coal, and other mineral leases upon the lands for which selection and division are herein provided, and all moneys received from the sale of town lots, together with the buildings thereon, and all moneys received from the sale of the three reservations of one hundred and sixty acres each heretofore reserved for developing purposes, and all moneys received from grazing lands, shall be placed in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the members of the Osage Tribe of Indians as other moneys of said tribe are to be deposited under the provisions of this Act, and the same shall be distributed to the individual members of said Osage tribe according to the roll provided for herein, in the manner and at the same time that payments are made of interest on other moneys held in trust for the Osages by the United States, except as herein provided.

Under the provisions of the foregoing act, the pro rata share of each Indian allottee aggregating $3,510.70 was placed to his credit in the Treasury of the United States. The royalty received from oil, gas, coal, and other minerals, together with the interest on the pro rata shares was disbursed to the Indians quarterly as they accrued.¹²⁴

¹²⁵ See Hearings, II Comm on Ind. Aff., H. R. 6234, 74th Cong., 1st sess., 1936, p. 113, and Act of June 24, 1938, 52 Stat. 1054, 1055. The District Court, in In re Denison, 88 F. 2d 662 (D. C. W. D. Okla., 1930), app. dismissed 45 F. 2d 535, defined a headright

What is an Osage "head-right"? This is thoroughly defined by the Act of 1906 and is nothing more than the interest that a member of the tribe has in the Osage tribal trust assets, and the level consists of the oil, gas, and mineral rights, and the funds which were placed to the credit of the Osage tribe, all fully set out in the above act. (P. 604.)

Another court has defined a headright as follows: "The right to receive the trust funds and the mineral interests at the end of the trust period, and during that period to participate in the distribution of the bonuses and royalties arising from the mineral estates and the interest on the trust funds, is an Osage headright." Globe Internat'l Co. v. Bruce, 81 F. 2d 148, 148-149 (C. C. A. 10, 1935). The tribal income derived from oil and gas sources up to June 1939 aggregated $297,000,990.98, which entire sum, less the amounts authorized by Congress to be expended for the expenses of the Osage Agency, were distributed under various acts of Congress, to which reference will hereinafter be made, to the Indians pro rata, the shares of deceased Indians being paid to their heirs or devisees. Also see In re Brown, 90 F. 2d 492 (C. C. A. 10, 1933). The headrights are not transmissible and do not pass to a co-heir in bankruptcy. Taylor v. Towner, 51 F. 2d 872 (C. C. A. 10, 1931), cert. den. 284 U. S. 873 (1931); Taylor v. Jones, 51 F. 2d 892 (C. C. A. 10, 1931), cert. den. 284 U. S. 688 (1931).

hundred and seven, the lands, mineral interests, and money, herein provided for and held in trust by the United States shall be the absolute property of the individual members of the Osage tribe, according to the roll herein provided for, or their heirs, as herein provided, and deeds to said lands shall be issued to said members, or to their heirs, as herein provided, and said moneys shall be distributed to said members, or to their heirs, as herein provided, and said members shall have full control of said lands, money, and mineral interest, except as hereinbefore provided.

Section 6 provides that the lands, money, and mineral interests, provided for in the act, of any deceased member of the Osage tribe shall descend to his or her legal heirs, according to the laws of the Territory of Oklahoma, or of the State in which said reservation may be hereinafter incorporated, except where the decedent leaves no issue, nor husband, nor wife, in which case the lands, money, and mineral interests must go to the mother and father equally.

When the Secretary of the Interior is satisfied that an individual Indian is able to manage his own property, the Secretary is permitted to issue to that Indian a certificate of competency.¹²¹ So long as the Indian has not received a certificate of competency, the income derived as his share of the tribal royalty is exempt from the application of federal income tax laws.¹²² The exemption, however, does not apply in favor of a white woman who receives income from land inherited from her children, members of the Osage tribe.¹²³

Under section 8 of the Act of April 18, 1912,¹²⁴ jurisdiction of the property of deceased and of orphan minor, insane, or other incompetent allottees of the Osage tribe was conferred on the county courts of the State of Oklahoma. The act provided that a copy of all papers filed in the county court shall be served on the Superintendent of the Osage Agency at the time of filing, and authorized the superintendent, whenever the interests of the allottee require, to appear in court for the protection of the interests of the allottee. The act further authorized the superintendent or the Secretary of the Interior, to investigate the conduct of executors, administrators, and guardians and to prosecute any remedy, civil or criminal, as the exigencies of the case and the preservation and protection of the allottee or his estate may require.

Section 5 of the Act of April 18, 1912, authorizes the Secretary of the Interior, in his discretion, under rules and regulations to be prescribed by him and upon application therefor, to pay to Osage allottees, including the blind, insane, crippled, aged, or helpless, all or part of the funds in the Treasury of the United States to their individual credit, with the proviso that he shall first be satisfied of the competency of the allottee or that the release of said individual trust funds would be to the manifest best interests and welfare of the allottee, and further, that no trust funds of a minor or of an allottee who is incompetent shall be released and paid over except to a guardian of such person duly appointed by the proper court and after the filing by such guardian and approval by the court of a sufficient bond satisfactorily to administer the funds released.

Section 6 of this act provides that the proceeds of partition sales due minor heirs, including such minor Indian heirs as may not be tribal members and those Indian heirs not having certificates of competency, shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States and placed to the credit of the Indians upon the same condition as attached to segregated shares of the Osage tribal fund, or with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior paid to the duly appointed guardian. The same disposition as provided in the act with reference to the proceeds of inherited lands sold is to be made of the money in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of deceased Osage allottees.

Section 7 of the act protected the funds of Osage Indians against any claim arising prior to the grant of a certificate of competency. It provided further that no lands or moneys inherited from Osage allottees shall be subject to or taken or sold to secure the payment of any indebtedness incurred by such heir prior to the time such lands and moneys are turned over to such heirs.

Section 8 authorized the disposition by will of all of the estate of an Osage Indian, including trust funds, with the provision that no such will should be admitted to probate or have any validity unless approved before or after the death of the testator by the Secretary of the Interior.

As stated by the United States Supreme Court in Work v Lynn,¹²⁵ it was believed when the 1903 Act was passed

"... that the income to be paid quarterly would not be in excess of the current needs of the members. For about ten years that proved to be true. Thereafter, increased production of oil and gas under the leases that were given resulted in royalties which swelled the income to a point where the quarterly payments were greatly in excess of current needs and were leading to gross extravagance and waste. Administrative measures restricting the payments were adopted, but their validity was questioned (see Work v Mosier, 261 U. S. 352) and the matter was called to the attention of Congress by the Secretary of the Interior. (P. 167.)

Because of the conditions outlined above, Congress in section 4 of the Act of March 3, 1921,¹²⁶ amended the Act of June 28, 1906, as follows:

That from and after the passage of this Act the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be paid at the end of each fiscal quarter to each adult member of the Osage Tribe having a certificate of competency his or her pro rata share, either as a member of the tribe or heir of a deceased member, of the interest on trust funds, the bonus received from the sale of leases, and the royalties received during the previous fiscal quarter, and so long as the income is sufficient to pay to the adult members of said tribe not having a certificate of competency $1,000 quarterly except where incompetent adult members have legal guardians, in which case the income of such incompetents shall be paid to their legal guardians, and to pay for maintenance and education to the parents or natural guardians or legal guardians actually having minor members under twenty-one years of age personally in charge $500 quarterly out of the income of said minors all of said quarterly payments to legal guardians and adults, not having certificates of competency to be paid under the supervision of the Superintendent of the Osage Agency, and to invest the remainder after paying all the taxes of such members either in United States bonds or in Oklahoma State, county, or school bonds, or place the same on time deposits at interest in banks in the State of Oklahoma for the benefit of each individual member under such rules and regulations as the Secretary of the

"... Until he has had a full opportunity to exercise this discretion, neither he (Assistant Secretary) nor the Secretary can be compelled by mandamus to make the payment, and if in the exercise he does not act capriciously, arbitrarily or beyond the scope of his authority, the writ will not issue at all. Interior may prescribe. Provided, That at the beginning of each fiscal year there shall first be reserved and set aside out of the Osage tribal funds available for that purpose a sufficient amount of money for the expenditures authorized by Congress out of the Osage funds for that fiscal year. Provided further, That all past existing individual obligations of adults not having certificates of competency outstanding upon the passage of this Act, when approved by the Superintendent of the Osage Agency, shall be paid out of the money of such individual as the same may be placed in his credit in addition to the quarterly allowance provided for herein.

Prior to the decision of the United States Supreme Court in Work v. Luna the foregoing provision was administratively interpreted as requiring payment to the legal guardians of adult restricted Osage Indians of the entire income of such Indians. As a result of the decision in the Luna case, Congress in the Act of February 27, 1925,¹⁰⁰ provided for the return by legal guardians to the Secretary of the Interior of all moneys in their possession or control, therefore paid them in excess of $400 per annum for adults and $200 for minors under the Act of March 3, 1921. The act also provided for delivery by the guardians to the Secretary of the Interior of all property, bonds, securities, and stock purchased, or investments made by such guardians out of the moneys paid them, to be held by the Secretary of the Interior or disposed of by him, as he shall deem to be for the best interests of the members to whom the same belong. The act further provided that all funds other than as above mentioned, and other property therefore or hereafter received by a guardian of a member of the Osage tribe of Indians, which was therefore under the supervision and control of the Secretary of the Interior or the title to which was held in trust for such Indians by the United States, shall not thereby become divested of the supervision and control of the Secretary of the Interior or the United States be relieved of its trust; and that the guardians should not dispose of or otherwise encumber such fund or property without the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, and in accordance with the orders of the county court of Osage County, Oklahoma. The act also provided that in case of the death, resignation, or removal from office of such a guardian, the funds and property in his possession subject to supervision and control of the Secretary of the Interior or to which the United States held the title in trust should be immediately delivered to the Superintendent of the Osage Agency, to be held by him and supervised and invested as provided by the terms of the act.

Congress also modified the payments to be made in behalf of enrolled or unenrolled minor members above 18 years of age so as to permit the parents or legal guardians of such minors to receive $1,000 quarterly. The provision with regard to the payment under the 1925 act reads as follows:

That the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be paid at the end of each fiscal quarter to each adult member of the Osage Tribe of Indians in Oklahoma having a certificate of competency his or her pro rata share, either as a member of the tribe or heir or devisee of a deceased member, of the interest on trust funds, the bonus received from the sale of oil or gas leases, the royalties therefrom, and any other moneys due such Indian received during each fiscal quarter, including all moneys received prior to the passage of this Act and remaining unpaid; and so long as the accumulated income is sufficient the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be paid to the adult members of said tribe not having a certificate of competency $1,000 quarterly, except where such adult members have legal guardians, in which case the amounts provided for herein may be paid to the legal guardian or direct to such Indian in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior the total amounts of such payments, however, shall not exceed $1,000 quarterly except as hereinafter provided, and shall cause to be paid for the maintenance and education, to either one of the parents or legal guardians actually having personally in charge, enrolled or unenrolled, minor member under twenty-one years of age, and above eighteen years of age, $1,000 quarterly out of the income of such said income, and out of the income of minors under eighteen years of age, $500 quarterly, and so long as the accumulated income of the parent or parents of a minor who has no income or whose income is less than $500 per quarter is sufficient, shall cause to be paid to either of said parents having the care and custody of such minor $500 quarterly, or such proportion thereof as the income of such minor may be less than $500, in addition to the allowances above provided for such parents. Rentals due such adult members from their lands and their minor children's lands and all succession from such adult's investments shall be paid to them in addition to the allowance above provided. All payments to legal guardians of Osage Indians shall be expended subject to the joint approval in writing of the court and the superintendent of the Osage Agency. All payments to adults not having certificates of competency, including amounts paid for each minor, shall, in case the Secretary of the Interior finds that such adults are wasting or squandering said income, be subject to the supervision of the superintendent of the Osage Agency. Provided, That if an adult member, not having a certificate of competency so desires, his entire income accumulating in the future from the sources herein specified may be paid to him without supervision, unless the Secretary of the Interior shall find, after notice and hearing, that such member is wasting or squandering his income, in which event the Secretary of the Interior shall pay to such member only the amounts hereinbefore specified to be paid to adult members not having certificates of competency. The Secretary of the Interior shall invest the remainder, after paying the taxes of such members, in United States bonds, Oklahoma State bonds, real estate, first-mortgage real estate loans not to exceed 50 per centum of the appraised value of such real estate, and where the member is a resident of Oklahoma such investment shall be in loans on Oklahoma real estate, stock in Oklahoma building and loan associations, livestock, or deposit the same in banks in Oklahoma, or expend the same for the benefit of such member, such expenditures, investments, and deposits to be made under such restrictions, rules, and regulations as he may prescribe. Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior shall not make any investment for an adult member without first securing the approval of such member of such investment.

(P. 1008-1009)

Under the same section Congress provided that no guardian shall be appointed, except on the written application or approval of the Secretary of the Interior, for the estate of a member of the Osage tribe of Indians who does not have a certificate of competency or who is of one-half or more Indian blood.

Section 3 of this act provides in part:

Property of Osage Indians not having certificates of competency purchased or hereinafter set forth shall not be subject to the lien of any debt, claim, or judgment except taxes, or be subject to alienation, without the approval of the Secretary of the Interior.

Section 4 of the Act of February 27, 1925,¹⁰¹ newly vested in the Secretary of the Interior power to revoke certificates of competency issued to an Osage Indian of more than one-half Indian blood, whom he finds, after notice and hearing, to be squandering or misusing his funds.

In section 6 of the act it was provided

No contract for debt hereafter made with a member of the Osage Tribe of Indians not having a certificate of competency, shall have any validity, unless approved by the Secretary of the Interior

In section 1 of the Act of March 2, 1923,¹²⁶ Congress provides

The lands, moneys, and other properties now or hereafter held in trust or under the supervision of the United States for the Osage Tribe of Indians, the members thereof, or their heirs and assigns, shall continue subject to such trust and supervision until January 1, 1930, unless otherwise provided by Act of Congress

Section 3 of this act provides

That section 1 of the Act of Congress of February 27, 1925 (Forty-third Statutes at Large, page 1008), is hereby amended by adding thereto the following

"The Secretary of the Interior be, and is hereby, authorized, in his discretion, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, upon application of any member of the Osage Tribe of Indians not having a certificate of competency, to pay all or any part of the funds held in trust for such Indians. Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior shall, within one year after this Act is approved, pay to each enrolled Indian of less than half Osage blood, one-fourth part of his or her proportionate share of accumulated funds. And such Secretary shall on or before the expiration of ten years from the date of the approval of this Act, advance and pay over to such Osage Indians of less than one-half Osage Indian blood, the balance appearing to his credit of accumulated funds, and shall issue to each Indian a certificate of competency. And provided further, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to interfere in any way with the removal by the Secretary of the Interior of restrictions from and against any Osage Indian at any time"

Section 4 of this act provides.

That section 2 of the Act of Congress approved February 27, 1925 (Forty-third Statutes at Large, page 1011), being an Act to amend the Act of Congress of March 8, 1921 (Forty-first Statutes at Large, page 1249), be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows

"Upon the death of an Osage Indian of one-half or more Indian blood who does not have a certificate of competency, his or her moneys and funds and other property accrued and accruing to his or her estate and which have heretofore been subject to supervision as provided by law may be paid to the administrator or executor of the estate of such deceased Indian or direct to his heirs or devisees, or may be retained by the Secretary of the Interior in his discretion at the Secretary of the Interior, under regulations to be promulgated by him. Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior shall pay to administrators and executors of the estates of such deceased Osage Indians a sufficient amount of money out of such estates to pay all lawful indebtedness and costs and expenses of administration when approved by him, and, out of the shares belonging to heirs or devisees, above referred to, he shall pay the costs and expenses of such heirs or devisees, including attorney fees, when approved by him, in the determination of heirs or contests of wills. Upon the death of any Osage Indian of less than one-half of Osage Indian blood or upon the death of an Osage Indian who has a certificate of competency, his moneys and funds and other property accrued and accruing to his estate shall be paid and delivered to the administrator or executor of his estate to be administered upon according to the laws of the State of Oklahoma. Provided, That upon the settlement of such estate any funds or property subject to the control or supervision of the Secretary of the Interior on the date of the approval of this Act, which have been inherited by or devised to any adult or minor heir or devisee of one-half or more Osage Indian blood who does not have a certificate of competency, and which have been paid or delivered by the Secretary of the Interior to the administrator or executor, shall be paid or delivered by such administrator or executor to the Secretary of the Interior for the benefit of such Indian and shall be subject to the supervision of the Secretary as provided by law"

Under section 5 of the act, the restrictions concerning lands and funds of allotted Osage Indians as provided in that act and all prior acts then in force, shall apply to unallotted Osage Indians born since July 1, 1907, or thereafter, and to their heirs of Osage Indian blood, except that the provision of section 6 of the Act of February 27, 1923, with reference to the validity of contracts for debt, shall not apply to any allotted or unallotted Osage Indian of less than one-half degree Indian blood, and subject to the further proviso that the Osage lands and funds, and any other property which had theretofore or which may hereafter be held in trust or under supervision of the United States for Osage Indians of less than one-half degree Indian blood not having a certificate of competency shall not be subject to forced sale to satisfy any debt or obligation contracted or incurred prior to the issuance of a certificate of competency, and with the further provision that the Secretary of the Interior was authorized in his discretion to grant a certificate of competency to any unallotted Osage Indian when in the judgment of the said Secretary such member is fully competent and capable of transacting his or her own affairs

That hereafter the Secretary of the Interior shall cause to be paid to each adult member of the Osage Tribe of Indians not having a certificate of competency his or her proportionate share, either as a member of the tribe or heir or devisee of a deceased member, of the interest on trust funds, the bonus received from the sale of oil or gas leases, and the royalties therefrom received during each fiscal quarter, not to exceed $1,000 per quarter, and if such adult member has a legal guardian, his current income not to exceed $1,000 per quarter may be paid to such legal guardian in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior. Provided, That when an adult restricted Indian has surplus funds in excess of $10,000 there shall be paid such Indian sufficient funds from his accumulated surplus in addition to his current income to aggregate $15,000 quarterly, but in the event of any adult restricted Indian whose surplus funds are less than $10,000, such adult shall receive quarterly only his current income not to exceed $1,000 per quarter. Provided further, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to and may in his discretion pay out of any moneys heretofore accrued or hereafter accruing to the credit of any person of Osage Indian blood who does not have a certificate of competency or who is one-half or more Osage Indian blood, all of said persons' taxes of every kind and character, for which said person is now or hereafter may be liable, before paying to or for such person any funds as required by law. And provided further, That upon application and consent of any restricted Osage Indian the Secretary of the Interior may cause payment to be made of additional funds from the accumulated surplus to the credit of any Osage Indian under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe. Provided, That such adult members from their lands and their minor children, or lands and all income from such adult's investments, including interest on deposits to their credit, shall be paid to them in addition to the current allowances above provided

Whenever minor members of the Osage Tribe of Indians have funds or property subject to the control or supervision of the Secretary of the Interior, the said Secretary may in his discretion pay or cause to be paid to the parents, legal guardian, or any person, school, or institution having actual custody of such minor, such amounts out of the income or funds of the said minors as he deems necessary, and when such a minor is eighteen years of age or over, the Secretary of the Interior may in his discretion cause disbursement of funds for support and maintenance or other specific purposes to be made direct to such minor. (17p 1034-1035)

C. INHERITANCE

Exclusive jurisdiction of the probate of wills and the determination of heirs of the Osages is vested in the state courts.¹²¹

If an Osage dies testate, the Secretary of the Interior is authorized to approve or disapprove the will prior to institution of probate proceedings in the local court.¹²² In the event that the will is disapproved, it may not be offered for probate, but if the will is approved, the state court is not bound by the Secretary's determination as to validity and it may permit the issue to be relitigated before it.

The power of an Osage Indian to make a will has been discussed by the Solicitor for the Department of the Interior.¹²³

There is no provision in the act of 1906, authorizing an Osage Indian to make a will. That authority is contained in Section 3 of the act of April 18, 1912 (37 Stat. 86, 88), entitled "An Act supplementary to and amendatory of the act" of June 23, 1906, which section provides:

"That any adult member of the Osage Tribe of Indians not mentally incompetent may dispose of any or all of his estate, real, personal, or mixed, including trust funds, from which restrictions as to alienation have not been removed, by will, in accordance with the laws of the State of Oklahoma. Provided, That no such will shall be admitted to probate or have any validity unless approved before the death of the testator by the Secretary of the Interior."

The act in section 3 thereof, subjects the property of deceased and incompetent Osage allottees in probate matters to the jurisdiction of the County Courts of the State of Oklahoma. The land of such persons, however, cannot be sold or alienated and no will can be admitted to probate without the prior approval of the Secretary of the Interior. The word "minor" or "minors" is used throughout the act of 1912, in connection with provisions similar to those found in the act of 1906. The clear indications are that the word as used in the later act means the same thing that it was declared to mean in the former act, that is, a person under 21 years of age. As stated the word "adult" in the act of 1906, as applied to both males and females refers to a person 21 years of age or over. In view of the fact that the act of 1912 is "supplemental to and amendatory of the act" of 1906, section 8 thereof which authorizes any "adult" member of the Osage tribe of Indians to dispose of his property by will must be read into the act of 1906. The section thus becomes a part of and must be construed in connection with said act of 1906. In this view there is no escape from the conclusion that the word "adult" in said section 8 means a person 21 years of age or over. It was the exclusive right of Congress to determine at what age an Osage Indian becomes capable of making a will. It declared that age to be 21 or majority. A law of Oklahoma declaring a person to be competent to make a will at 18 years of age is directly in conflict with the Federal statute and the latter is controlling. Trustett v. Closser (108 Fed. 886; 236 U. S. 223); Priddy v. Thompson (204 Fed. 955); Leita v. Leita (176 Pac. 234). It follows that testatrix not having reached the age of 21 years was for that reason incapable of making a valid will.

D. LEASING

1. Tribe oil and gas and mineral leases.—The greater part of the income from leases of the Osage Indians is derived from oil and gas lands. During the fiscal year 1924 the oil rights to 70,737 acres in the Osage Reservation were sold by means of bids for $17,530,800.¹²⁴ In the introduction to the discussion of the Osages, it has been shown that the title to the oil and gas in the Osage Reservation is held for the benefit of the tribe even though the surface has been allotted in severalty to individuals.

Section 3 of the Osage Allotment Act of June 28, 1906,¹²⁵ directed that the oil, gas, coal, or other minerals covered by the allotted lands should be reserved to the Osage tribe for 25 years from and after April 8, 1906, and provided that mineral leases for such lands might be made by the tribal council with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior under such rules and regulations as he might prescribe.¹²⁶ Under the seventh paragraph of section 2 it was provided that oil, gas, and other minerals should become the property of the owner of the land at the expiration of 25 years, unless otherwise provided by Congress.

Section 3 of the 1906 act was amended by the Act of March 8, 1921,¹²⁷ so as to extend the reservation of minerals to the tribe to April 7, 1940. All valid existing oil and gas leases on April 7, 1931, were renewed upon the same terms, and extended, until April 8, 1940, and so long thereafter as oil or gas was found in paying quantities. The 1921 act also directed the Secretary of the Interior and the Osage Council "to offer for lease for oil and gas purposes all of the remaining portions of the unleased Osage land prior to April 8, 1931, offering the same annually at a rate of not less than one-tenth of the unleased area."

This provision was again amended by the Act of March 2, 1929,¹²⁸ which extended the period of reservation to the Osage tribe of the minerals covered by such lands until April 8, 1938, unless otherwise provided by act of Congress. The 1929 act also amended the provision requiring the leasing of lands by the Secretary of the Interior and the Osage Council by providing:—

"* * * That not less than twenty-five thousand acres shall be offered for lease for oil and gas mining purposes during any one year. Provided further, That as to all lands heretofore leased, the regulations governing same and the leases issued thereon shall contain appropriate provisions for the conservation of the natural gas for its economic use, to the end that the highest percentage of ultimate recovery of both oil and gas may be secured; Provided, however, That nothing herein contained shall be construed as affecting any valid existing lease for oil or gas or other minerals, but all such leases shall continue as long as gas, oil, or other minerals are found in paying quantities."

Section 3 of the Act of June 24, 1938,¹²⁹ amended the 1929 act to provide that the minerals covered by such reserved lands shall be reserved:

"* * * until the 8th day of April, 1968, unless otherwise provided by Act of Congress, and all royalties and bonuses arising therefrom shall belong to the Osage Tribe of Indians, and shall be disbursed to members of the Osage Tribe or their heirs or assigns as now provided by law, after reserving such amounts as are now or may hereafter be authorized by Congress for specific purposes."

thereof, or their heirs and assigns, shall continue subject to such trusts and supervision until January 1, 1984, unless otherwise provided by Act of Congress.

2 Agricultural leases of restricted lands—Section 7 of the Osage Allotment Agreement of June 28, 1906,¹²⁷ authorizes the allottees of the Osage tribe and their heirs to lease their lands for mining, grazing, or other purposes, but requires all lease, for the benefit of the individual allottees of the tribe or their heirs to be approved by the Secretary of the Interior before becoming effective.¹²⁸

The Wheeler-Howard bill as originally introduced applied to the State of Oklahoma.¹²⁸ The bill was amended at the suggestion of Senator Thomas of Oklahoma, chairman of the Senate Indian Affairs Committee, so as to make inapplicable to the tribes in Oklahoma¹²⁹ those sections which extended existing trust periods, limited alienation of restricted land, authorized the establishment of new reservations, and authorized tribal organization.

Two years later these provisions of the Wheeler-Howard Act were extended to Oklahoma, with some modifications to fit the peculiarities of the local legal situation. Under the Thomas Rogers Oklahoma Indian Welfare Act, the Indians of Oklahoma became eligible to share in the program of self-government, corporate organization, credit and land purchase. This act also provided for the organization of Indians into voluntary cooperative associations for the purposes of credit administration, production, marketing, consumer protection or land management, and authorized an appropriation of $2,000,000 for loans to such associations and to individual Indians of the state.¹³⁰

Under this act a considerable number of the Oklahoma tribes have adopted tribal constitutions and obtained corporate charters.¹³¹

These constitutions and charters differ in several respects from those adopted by tribes of other states.¹³² For one thing, the substantive powers of the tribe are set forth in the charters, rather than in constitutions. The constitutions are restricted to such topics as membership and tribal organization. Another important characteristic of the Oklahoma tribal constitutions and charters is that none of them contain the broad police and judicial powers found in many other tribal documents. This lack may be ascribed to legislation already discussed,¹³³ depriving tribal courts in the Indian Territory of all power, and to the practical assumption by the State of Oklahoma of responsibilities which are elsewhere divided between federal and tribal authorities.

REFERENCE TABLES AND INDEX

EXPLANATION OF REFERENCE TABLES AND INDEX

The various tables that comprise this supplement constitute the first comprehensive attempt to collect and systematize the basic materials of Federal Indian law. These materials include the statutes and treaties of the United States, the decisions of federal courts, including territorial courts, the administrative rulings of the Attorney General and of the Department of the Interior, legal texts and periodicals and congressional and other public documents. An attempt has been made to make these compilations complete with respect to published statutes, treaties (published and unpublished), reported federal cases, published opinions of the Attorney General and published rulings of the Interior Department. Such completeness, however, extends only to the date on which this compilation was begun, April 14, 1939. A few later items of special importance, appearing between this date and the completion of the compilation and handbook on July 1, 1940, have been inserted in the various tables. With respect to unpublished administrative rulings, legal texts and periodicals, and congressional and other public documents, a complete coverage has not been attempted but an effort has been made to include in this compilation the most important materials in the field. The analysis of unpublished memoranda of the Lands Division of the Department of Justice goes back as far as the year 1928, and the search for unpublished decisions and memoranda in the files of the Interior Department was carried back as far as October 31, 1917. The published decisions of the Interior Department go back to July, 1851. Statutes, court decisions, and other official materials have been compiled as far back as the adoption of the Constitution in 1789, except that treaties of the United States preceding the Constitution, and recognized therein, have been included.

A count of the number of items of each category collected and utilized in the preparation of this supplement gives the following approximate figures:

Statutes	4,284
Treaties	889
Reported Cases	1,725
Opinions of the Attorney General, etc.	323
Interior Department Rulings	338
Legal Texts and Articles	629
Tribal Constitutions	141
Tribal Charters	112
Congressional Reports and Miscellaneous	801
Total Number of Items	8,922

This supplement to the Handbook of Federal Indian Law is composed of seven parts: (1) the tribal index of materials on Indian law, (2) the annotated table of statutes and treaties, (3) the table of federal cases, (4) the table of Interior Department rulings, (5) the table of Attorney General's opinions, (6) the bibliography, and (7) the index. A few words concerning each of these parts may be of assistance to those who make use of this supplement.

Tribal Index of Materials on Indian Law—The tribal index attempts to show, for each tribe, the special statutes, treaties, decisions and other legal materials that concern that tribe.

The importance of a tribe-by-tribe index of materials on Indian law arises from the fact that during the greater part of our national existence we have dealt with Indian tribes through treaty or agreement, through special legislation, and, most recently, through tribal constitutions approved by the Federal Government and federal charters approved by the Indian tribes. Thus there has developed, for each tribe and reservation, a special body of law which supplements or modifies general legislation on Indian affairs. Thus any general analysis of problems of federal Indian law, such as is attempted in the Handbook itself, necessarily contains an element of incompleteness. To help in the filling of that gap this guide to special legal materials affecting each tribe and reservation has been prepared.

An attempt has been made to reflect faithfully legislative and administrative usage in the designation of Indian groups covered by federal legislation. In many instances the groups thus designated are not "tribes" in the anthropological sense, but portions or groupings of such "tribes." Political existence rather than racial unity has been the chief criterion of group existence in the history of Indian treaties and Indian legislation. This index is primarily a roster of such political entities. Where ethnological designations vary from political usage, such ethnological designations have been noted parenthetically following the primary listing.

Since a single tribe is frequently referred to in several different groupings, cross-references have been included to show other designations for a given tribe and to show the designations of other groups that include the tribe in question or are included therein.

Annotated Table of Statutes and Treaties—In the statutory index an effort has been made to annotate each act of Congress, treaty, and joint or concurrent resolution with pertinent legal materials, statutory and non-statutory. The effect of this statutory index is to show for each provision of federal law relating to Indians, the legal background against which the law was enacted and the functioning of the law since its enactment.

The annotations include under each statutory item the following materials: (1) Reference to earlier and later statutes and treaties, which supplement, amend, or repeal, or are supplemented, amended, or repealed by, the annotated item; (2) Reference to federal cases in which the statutory item is cited; (3) Similar references to Attorney General's opinions in which the statutory item is cited; (4) Parallel citations to Revised Statutes; (5) Parallel citations to the United States Code; (6) Historical annotations taken from the United States Code Annotated; (7) Published and unpublished decisions and memoranda of the Interior Department; (8) Unpublished memoranda of the Lands Division of the Department of Justice; (9) Legal texts; (10) Legal periodicals; (11) Congressional and other government documents.

Table of Federal Cases.—The table of federal cases on Indian law covers reported cases in the federal (including the territorial) courts during the period from 1790 to 1939 in which issues of federal Indian law are considered. In this table the various cases are annotated for appeals, overrulings, and related decisions.

Table of Interior Department Rulings.—The table of Interior Department rulings on Indian matters from 1881 to 1939, contains volume and page reference to published rulings and file number reference to unpublished materials, together with the date and indication of subject matter for each ruling. Included in this table are a number of rulings of other agencies which are available in Interior Department files.

Table of Attorney General's Opinions.—The table of published Attorney General's Opinions from 1789 to 1939 on matters of Indian law contains volume, page, date and title for each opinion. Unpublished memoranda of the Lands Division of the Department of Justice collected by that Department from 1929 to 1939 are cited in the tribal and statutory indices, but are not listed as a separate table.

Bibliography.—The bibliography is composed of four parts: the major compilations of federal Indian laws, treaties and regulations; important legal literature—periodicals and texts; background materials, including works on Indian policy and administration; and congressional documents (including American Archives, American State Papers, and Journals of the Continental Congress) pertaining to Indian affairs, either cited in the various indices or the Handbook or of prime importance to an understanding of the development of Indian legislation and policy in the United States.

Index.—The index covers the principal topics treated in the Handbook of Federal Indian Law. It may be supplemented by reference to the Analysis of Chapters, at pages XIX to XXIV of the Handbook.

In order to conserve space, references to case materials, statutory materials and other materials cited in this supplement are given in the most concise form possible. These citations, however, may be elaborated by reference to the appropriate table. Thus, a case cited by the first word or phrase, e. g., Adams, 59 F. 2d 633, may be identified in the table of federal cases more fully described as ADAMS v. OSAGE TRIBE OF INDIANS, 59 F. 2d 633 (C. C. A. 10, 1932), aff'g 50 F. 2d 918 (D. C. N. D. Okla. 1931), cert. den. 287 U. S. 652. Where the first party named in the title of the case is the United States, the citation includes in addition the first word or phrase identifying the adverse party. Likewise a citation to a legal text, law review article or congressional document can be amplified by a reference to the bibliography. Thus, for example, the citation: "Black, II," will be found by reference to Part II, Literature on Indian Law, Section 2, Treats, to designate a volume of Henry Campbell Black entitled Intoxicating Liquors, published in 1892.

The publication of this supplement affords a welcome opportunity to acknowledge the contributions of those who have labored in the collection and systematization of the thousands of items comprised in these various tables. The collection and analysis of legal materials was in the hands of attorneys Fred V. Folsom, Jr., Abraham Glasser, Theodore H. Haas, Samuel Miller, Mrs. Muna Pollitt, Miss Bettie Renner, and Miss Doris Williamson, all of the Department of Justice. The collection of subsidiary historical, anthropological, and administrative materials was accomplished by Miss Lucy Kramer and Dr. David Rodnick, ethnologists in the Office of Indian Affairs, Fred A. Baker, Field Agent of the Office of Indian Affairs, and Miss Mary K. Morris, of the Department of Justice. The compiling of the annotated table of statutes was the work of Miss Renner; the index of tribal materials and the table of Interior Department rulings were compiled by Mrs. Pollitt; the table of federal cases was prepared by Samuel Miller; the bibliography is the work of Miss Morris and Miss Kramer; and the index was prepared by Miss Irene R. Shiber, an attorney in the Office of Indian Affairs.

The arduous task of putting all these materials into form for publication was assumed by Mrs. Griselda G. Lobell and Miss Marie J. Turinsky. To John H. Ady, Chief of the Publications Section of the Department of the Interior, went the task of seeing this supplement through the press.

- Historical Note This provision superseded R S 3041, prescribing the duties of the commissioners, and authorizing them to supervise all expenditures of money appropriated for the benefit of Indians, as well as to inspect goods purchased, etc. An inquiry into conditions in the Indian service, with a view to ascertaining any and all facts relating to the conduct and management of the Bureau of Indian Affairs, and of recommending such changes in the administration of Indian Affairs as would promote the betterment of the service and the well-being of Indians, by commission to be known as the Joint Commission to Investigate Indian Affairs, to be composed of 3 Members of the Senate, and 3 Members of the House of Representatives, which was authorized to examine into the conduct and management of the Bureau of Indian Affairs and all its branches and agencies, their organization and administration, the findings, conclusions, and recommendations of such commission to be reported to Congress during the 63d Congress, was provided for by Act June 30, 1914, § 1, 48 St. 81. See 1-p 85, 25 U S C 75*, sec. 1-p 87, 11 St. 2034, 25 U S C 75. USCA Historical Note: R S 2539 as originally enacted in the Rev Stat was based on Act of Feb 27, 1851, sec 4, 9 St. 587, and Act Apr. 8, 1851, sec. 1, 12 St. 40, and did not contain the words at the end thereof "And until his successors in duty appointed and qualified." This clause was added by amendment by instant Act. Sec 4-25 U S C 46 (23 St. 97, sec 4)* USCA Historical Note: 23 St. 97, sec 6 also contains a provision substantially in the same terms as that of the Code section. 25 U S C 63 (23 St. 97, sec 6). for other purposes." See 1, p 79-25 U S C 278, (38 St 988, sec 21). USCA Historical Note A purpose following the derivative provision in sec 1, 30 St 62, which authorized the Secretary of the Interior to make contracts with schools of various denominations for the education of Indian pupils during the fiscal year 1898, but only at places where nonsectarian schools could not be provided, was omitted as temporary merely. A provision of Act June 20, 1898, s 10, 25 Stat 280, that at certain schools, at which "church organizations are assisting in the educational work, the Christian Bible may be taught in the native language of the Indians," etc., may be regarded as amended by a provision that the Government should, as early as practicable, make provision for the education of Indian children in Government schools, made by Act Mar 2, 1906, s 1, 28 St 901, and by said derivative provision. Similar provisions to the Code section were made by the Indian Appropriation Act of June 10, 1896, s 1, 29 Stat 315 Sec 1, p 38-27 U S C 474 (Sec 25 U S C 472) Sec 1, p 30-25 U S C 68 (sec 10, 37 St 88, sec 1, 37 St 621 sec 17, 40 St 678, 45 St 1307) See Historical Note US S C A 38 Sec 1, p 30-25 U S C 184 USCA Historical Note The derivative section used the word "heretofore" instead of the words of the Code section "prior to June 7, 1897." See 1, p 30-25 U S C 197 (32 St 404, sec 4) USCA Historical Note Sec 1, 30 St 90 originally provided with reference to the Chippewa Indians of Minnesota, that the Secretary of the Interior might authorize them to "fell, cut, sell, or otherwise dispose of the dead timber, etc., and the amendment by said sec 4 of 32 St 404, consisted in regarding so much of the quoted phrase as authorized the sale of dead timber, standing or fallen under regulations prescribed by the Secretary of the Interior. USCA Code Supplement 25 U S C 197 was repealed except as to then existing contracts by 32 St 404 Sec 11-25 USCA 134 Historical Note A provision made by Act June 7, 1897, sec 11, 30 St 93, "That heretofore, where funds appropriated in specific terms for particular objects are not sufficient for the object named, any other appropriation, general in its terms, which otherwise would be available may, in the discretion of the Secretary of the Interior, be used to accomplish the object for which the specific appropriation was made," was repealed by Act Mar 4, 1924, sec 1, 80 St 1062

for the current and contingent expense, of the Indian Department, for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, and for other purposes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1909. 25 U. S. C. 47 (sec. 23, 36 St. 61). 25 U. S. C. 52. 25 U. S. C. 54. 25 U. S. C. 205. See USCA Historical Note 25 U. S. C. 12; 25 U. S. C. 103. USCA Historical Note Recent Indian appropriation acts make appropriations for the purchase of goods, etc., for the Indian Service, with provision that no part of the sum so appropriated shall be used for the maintenance of not to exceed three permanent warehouses in the Indian Service. The provision of the fiscal year 1917, was by Act May 13, 1916, sec. 1, 39 St. 123, and limited the appropriation there made to the maintenance of not exceeding two permanent warehouses. 25 U. S. C. 151. USCA Historical Note: A provision identical with the Code Section, except that the banks which may be selected as depositories are not confined to National Banks, is contained in sec. 1, of Act June 25, 1910, 36 St. 895, and set out in 25 U. S. C. 372. See Historical Note 25 U. S. C. A. 20. 45 U. S. C. 93, 95 U. S. C. 392.
